1) Get Iran to force Maliki to the table with the Sunnis. NOW. They'll agree. They don't want to be fighting in Iraq any more than we do.

Nassim N. Taleb @nntaleb
@AlexBerenson Not possible: ISIS is not mainstream sunnis, the Salafis have their own agenda.

Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson
@nntaleb Agree. Why we need the tribes to help. Which means convincing them Maliki won't f--- them as soon as the pressure's off.

Cannabis causes psychosis. Psychosis causes violence. The advocacy community can keep pretending otherwise, but nothing is more real than a murder. Sunland, Washington, April 2017:

sanity at the time of Cynthia Little's death is mixed and should be left to a jury.

Bonner, 19, is charged with second-degree murder, first-degree animal cruelty and first-degree robbery for allegedly beating Little to death with a fireplace poker, killing her pet dog and driving her vehicle from Sunland to his home on Bainbridge Island on May 4, 2017.

Little was 71.

Bonner is being held in the Clallam County jail on

At the January arraignment, Superior Court Judge Brian Coughenour ordered Bonner to be evaluated for insanity by a state Department of Social and Health Services expert.

Barry Ward of DSHS's Office of Forensic Mental Health Services concluded in a Nov. 14 report that Bonner had paranoid schizophrenia, marijuana use disorder and was "acutely psychotic" at the time of the alleged crimes.

"Evidence of legal insanity is mixed, and is appropriately left to the finder of fact [at trial]," Ward wrote.

Bonner told investigators that he had stopped taking anti-psychotic medication in the months

Beau - Don't know if you have read the book yet, but many of the studies that I cite are post-2012. I found few studies before 2010 (your paper cites 9 solid papers in all). As you correctly said, "the literature focused on marijuana use is insufficient."

4/ I realize correlation is not necessarily causation, and all of this may be coincidence, but given the known link between psychosis and violence, and the known link between marijuana and psychosis, dismissing it out of hand is even more foolish than assuming it's correct.

I can't remember the last time a group of advocates for a smoked product screamed so loudly that correlation didn't prove causation. Can anyone help?

Not quite sure what your point is really. We all know cannabis can be linked to mental health problems, while we all know that the links between cannabis and violence are highly tenuous. What are you adding?

No one is denying risk relations, but that is not causality, that is a statistical probability—and the complicated relationship with mental illness is fundamentally different then claiming causality with homicide rates, which I am pretty sure the NAM does not endorse.

Dr. Hill: Simple yes or no question: Is your position that using cannabis does not raise the risk for schizophrenia? The National Academy of Medicine says there is "substantial evidence" it does, and the risk is dose-dependent. What do you say? Yes? Or no?

This is not a yes/no question. The risk analysis cannot take into account underlying biological variables that influence this relationship. Do I think cannabis is detrimental in the development or course of schizophrenia, yes. Do I think cannabis causes schizophrenia de novo, no.

Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson · 45s
So a higher risk ratio does not translate into de novo cases? That's... Interesting math. Or is NAM's assertion of increased risk inaccurate?

These are yes or no questions, no matter how much you might wish they aren't.

Upton Sinclair said it best: "It is difficult to get a man to understand something when his salary depends on his not understanding it." (One of my favorite all-time quotes, and the epigraph to my first book.)

Funny. Over my 17 years working to reform marijuana laws and end the irrational practice of arresting individuals for using a substance objectively less harmful than alcohol, I have often used that quote about law enforcement.

I love the way you happily stigmatize a whole category of people with an illness just so you can make a lame attempt to throw cannabis under the bus.

Do you think people with mental illness need more stigma heaped upon them or less?

To be clear: we cannot yet know that cannabis legalization has driven violent crime higher in the first states to legalize. But we do know that the claim by advocates that legalization would reduce violent crime (either absolutely or relative to overall US changes) is nonsense.

A 2018 study published in Nature Neuroscience, for example, suggested that it's more likely that schizophrenia leads to marijuana use (potentially to cope or self-medicate), not the other way around.

Your whole book's premise is: "cannabis causes violence & its legalization increases violent crime."

Now: "we cannot yet know that cannabis legalization has driven violent crime higher"

I wonder if all the journalists who eagerly reprinted @benconomics's chart will now acknowledge he used a state that legalized recreational marijuana as a control in his model to, erm, states that legalized recreational marijuana. I believe social scientists call that an oopsie.

You complain I didn't have 2017 in data, and dared me extend my sample out one year holding my control state fixed, which I did. Seems like you are working to generate oopsies.

New graphs are coming dropping those states. What's your prediction?

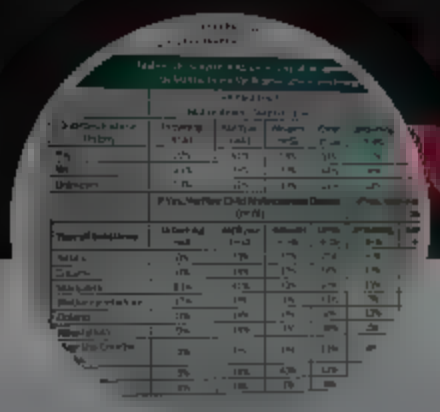
Alex Berenson ✓ @AlexBerenson · 2h

My prediction is twofold:



1) The output will be very sensitive to the states included in the fake state comparator.
2) Advocates and advocacy journalists will keep ignoring the actual murder and aggravated assault figures.

PS Hope you use the proper murder figures this time.

1/ Let's talk about the National Academy of Medicine report. "Cannabis use is likely to increase the risk of developing schizophrenia and other psychoses." So the 16-member NAM committee found in 2017. A week ago, one member dissociated herself from those findings.

bc repeatedly quotes on its Website from a 1999 federal report playing down the health risks of marijuana without acknowledging a new and much more critical report from the same group. Pretty much the definition of misleading.

The 1999 IOM report - which has been superseded by the 2017 NAM report. You know, the one that says marijuana is causally linked to psychosis and the higher the dose, the higher the risk? Weirdly, I can't find that information anywhere on your site...

Kevin speaks for himself - I know he likes the book but I'd never spoken to him until after it was essentially done. (I did interview Ethan and Rob and I quote them at length - I particularly like Ethan, who clearly wasn't trying to get rich off legalization.)

Good grief! I mean... It's at least refreshing to see [redacted] accurately quote the NASEM report, whose findings he has been mischaracterizing in op-eds and interviews for the past two weeks. An association is not necessarily causation.

Apparently you can't read the op-ed any better than my book or the original report. They all say the same thing. Btw - I must have missed the tweet where you asked users to stop screaming at my family.

I'm glad @drearlhart took some time out from his important work on opioids and methamphetamine to talk about cannabis:

For example, pretending that a report doesn't say what it says because one of the 16 members on the committee that put it together has dissociated herself from the plain language of its findings, while the other 15 have not? I think I get it.

Why not quote the conclusion of the chapter? "There is substantial evidence of a statistical association between cannabis use and the development of schizophrenia or other psychoses, with the highest risk among the most frequent users."

Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson · 24m
Why not quote the FIRST SENTENCE of the chapter? Or the press release summarizing its findings? Or the many other studies showing a link between use and psychosis I did quote, none of which Ziva Cooper or anyone else disputes? I don't have to pick cherries, I bought the bushel.

Cannabis [alongside Adderall in this case] causes paranoia and psychosis. Psychosis causes violence. The cases aren't the data, but the data reveals itself in the horror of the cases.

I'm not the problem. The facts are the problem.

2/ Then ask yourself? Does it present a biologically plausible thesis? Is the historical evidence consistent? Is there real-world data (and case reports) that tend to support it? Does it draw on many peer-reviewed studies?

3/ And most of all: If this theory is true - I am not asking you to concede it's true, merely to acknowledge the book makes a plausible case to anyone who is not already an advocate - are there public health implications we should discuss? Try it. You might surprise yourself.

Yap at me all you like, advocates. This drug is destroying lives every day. And encouraging its use is a public health nightmare. You aren't fighting me. You're fighting reality.

Your book saved our son's life

Alex. We have not met. but my husband and I went and got your book the day you appeared on CNN in early January. It changed our lives

Just prior to that, over Christmas, we thought our 18 yr old son was having a mental break. We had called the police on him 1/2 a dozen times over a two week period. He was threatening suicide every other day, and at one point I was assaulted by him. I had to go to urgent care for a black eye and bloody lip. It was also during this time that (our son) was smoking marijuana heavily (and had been for nearly two years) and even making dabs in our attic (with a butane torch). To my horror, I found out my husband had

Primary

Thank god he read the book. He said he was shocked, but completely convinced that you were right... commenting on how well the book was written.

So for 5 weeks now, our son has not had any form of marijuana ... and my husband is now completely on board. The first two weeks were hell ... withdrawals and anxiety were extreme ... but gradually things got better. Today he is here with me and it's another day where I thank god we didn't lose him. We have had so many great rational, thoughtful and meaningful conversations in the past few weeks. He's a completely different person off of marijuana. We got our son back thanks to you, and I am forever grateful. I know the story could've ended differently. This is only the beginning of a new chapter ..

A handy cannabis-advocate-to-English translation guide:
"Cherry-picking" = "Presenting data I don't like"
"Reefer Madness" = "Science that shows cannabis may cause severe mental illness."
"Correlation is not causation" = "It worked for tobacco companies."

As @orcarlnart notes, drugs encourage empathy. In Oregon, Mark Gago wanted to get close to his mother and 9-month-old daughter. He used an ax to express his feelings.

A man whose rampage with an ax left four dead near Woodburn had methamphetamine, alcohol and marijuana in his system, according to toxicology results released Thursday by the Oregon Medical Examiner's Office.

Mark Leo Gago, 42, was fatally shot at the scene by Clackamas County sheriff's deputies.

Sweet of @drcarlhart to tell us the truth that a lot of drug policy reformers try to hide: it's not really about "harm reduction" or social justice or any pretense of minimizing use. Because drugs are good, "overwhelmingly bring ppl joy," and encourage empathy.

Thoughts on the crucial new paper on cannabis and violence:

1) 6 of the 12 studies have come since 2016. The evidence is piling up fast.
2) Of course the researchers weren't American. (They're a Montreal group.)
3) Of course the media has ignored it.

That there is a "moderate association" between cannabis use and violence in patients with "severe mental illnesses" isn't really newsworthy. We've known the same is true for many licit and illicit psychoactive substances for decades.

2/ And heavy use to a six-fold risk of violence. The researchers screened almost 2500 papers. "These findings are clinically relevant for violence prevention," they concluded. But, please, keep pretending that Tell Your Children "cherry-picks" or misunderstands the science.

> Of the potential 2449 articles that were screened for eligibility, 12 studies were analyzed using a random-effect meta-analysis. Results showed a moderate association between cannabis use and violence (OR = 3.02, CI = 2.01–4.54, $p = 0.0001$). The association was significantly higher when comparing cannabis misuse (OR = 5.8, CI = 3.27–10.28, $p = 0.0001$) to cannabis use (OR = 2.04, CI = 1.36–3.05, $p = 0.001$).

If you haven't noticed, cannabis advocates lie. Not once in a while. All the time. And that's - well, that's no surprise. Politicians lie. Businesses lie. I don't expect more from advocates. The problem isn't that they lie; it's that reporters don't question those lies.

15/ The synthetic? Not so much. The two lines – which move in lockstep before 2013 (as they were designed to do) – break apart afterwards. It looks like THC-related deaths in the comparator rose about 40 percent after 2013 – less than half as much as they rose in the real CO.

Must be tough being on Team Cannabis these days. To have the most moral ideas, hang with the smartest friends - who think just like you, coincidentally! - and then one day to wake up to a health crisis that... you helped cause. Bet the money helps w/the cognitive dissonance, tho.

Mr. Berenson:

Almost exactly a year ago, our then 18-year-old son was hospitalized with a psychosis with symptoms of hearing voices, depression, paranoia and hallucinations. He was both suicidal and homicidal. Though medicated, he had two more serious "breaks" since then. All three hospitalizations were brought on by marijuana use.

I would like to send your book to all the doctors and therapists he has seen this past year, as well as people in

Addiction economics will fine her pockets well. So many elected officials preach equality and justice but want to put pot shops and grows in your communities that will bring more crime, drugs and mental illness. Drugs are the ultimate weapon and marijuana is an insidious bomb.

Cannabis-enhanced parenting at its finest, amirite, [redacted]? Will be seeing this on [redacted] anytime soon?

I agree with you to a point that marijuana has risks but this wasn't marijuana killing the child it was irresponsible parents. You don't blame alcohol for a drunk driver accident so don't blame cannabis for negligent parenting.

1/ I promised myself I wouldn't spend the day tearing apart this absurd study that purports to show that recreational marijuana laws reduce teen use, but I can't help myself. Of course @benconomics is one of the authors. Which in and of itself makes the study seriously suspect...

2/ You may remember Ben as the guy who said legalization wasn't tied to a rise in THC-linked driving deaths when his own paper said that it was responsible for half the rise. Or the guy who used the wrong data set to look at changes in murder rates and never fixed his mistake.

Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson · 33m

3/ Now Ben and other scholars have written a paper supposedly showing recreational legalization actually reduces teenage cannabis use. Okay, what would the mechanism be here? I've heard two, both equally specious after oh about three seconds of thought.

Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson · 31m

4/ The first is that licensed dispensaries won't sell to teenagers, but drug dealers will. Let's assume that theory is 100 percent correct. In that case, DOES LEGALIZATION ELIMINATE THE DEALERS WILLING TO SELL TO TEENAGERS? Of course not!

9/ First off, the relative changes are quite small and barely reach statistical significance. The researchers say they are drawing on a million-plus observations but that is hugely misleading - only four states have more than two years of data, and this is state-level data.

10/ Second, and more importantly, the researchers focus almost exclusively on RELATIVE changes while ignoring absolute levels of use in legalized states. Guess what - the five states with the most teen cannabis use are Vermont, Oregon, Colorado, Alaska, and Massachusetts.

11/ 12-17 year-olds in those states were up to 45 percent more likely to use cannabis than the national average. Know what those states have in common? Not geography, not the presence or absence of large cities, not wealth. Nope. But they all have legalized cannabis.

Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson · 8m

12/ And yet reporters lap up this counterfactual nonsense. Why? Did they learn nothing from the cannabis-reduces-opioid-deaths scam? Meanwhile a real, smart, case-controlled papers showing a serious risk of cannabis use in pregnancy goes unnoticed.

Hey @cameron_kasky - I don't know if you're aware, but Nikolas Cruz used cannabis regularly/heavily leading up to his attack. Cannabis causes psychosis; psychosis causes violence. THC is less physically dangerous than alcohol but much more neurotoxic. @Cernovich

> Unpopular opinion: Parents that talk to their kids about how wasted they're going to get in college and basically encourage it but are staunchly against their child smoking pot have absolutely no understanding of what alcohol does to people vs. what pot does to people.

Just another nonviolent California cannabis farmer nonviolently kidnapping and sexually assaulting a 15-year-old girl. At least he didn't nonviolently starve her to death in a car like the cultists at the farm in Colorado. Happens all the time with wheat too, amirite?

Apparently @markarkleiman has died. Here's where I'm supposed to say that even though we disagreed he was smart and cared deeply about public policy.

I'll say this instead: De mortuis nil nisi bonum. And so I have very little to add.

Not a great day for @washingtonpost and other proponents of cannabis-enhanced parenting; at least 3 child abuse deaths involving marijuana came up, including this one, the worst of all - the baby may have died of vomit resulting from THC ingestion.

Then again the coroner also reported a brain injury that mom and dad - who were busy making pot brownies when they weren't smoking - didn't seem to know about. Can pot make you a better parent, ? How about we stop asking dumb questions and agree the answer's no?

better parent?

Touting the benefits of 'being present', some parents claim marijuana helps with their job - but the facts are uncertain

Today's news: Cannabis is terrible for pregnant and breastfeeding mothers, anyone whose brain is still developing, and anyone in the vicinity of anyone with psychosis. Aside from that, no worries!

A boy in my son's 8th grade class smoked pot belonging to his mother. He began hallucinating and stabbed himself to death. Im sure it was laced w something.

Broke your heart, did I, doctor? I'm not sure why. Methadone's been around a long time - its use well predates what's happened in the US the last 20 years, so blaming it seems silly. I'm thinking about much broader issues in the way we talk about and promote all manner of drugs.

Which part? That we stigmatized tobacco use? Or that tobacco use declined after we stigmatized it? If by "complete BS" you mean absolutely factually correct, sure, its complete BS.

Stigma doesn't make ppl quit smoking. Awareness of the damage it causes does. Stigma serves no positive function at all. Nothing and yes his comment remains BS.

Brandon A. Dorfman @BaDorfman · 31. Aug.
Because that works for drugs & alcohol. You'd have to not have been alive for the last 20 years not to see that smoking is one of the most stigmatized vices around and the positive effect that's had on smoking rates. Just last week Netflix said they won't show smokers anymore.

Instead of calling it "medication assisted treatment" like it's chemo or something. Giving opioid addicts a less dangerous and maybe less euphoric opioid in the hopes they'll avoid more dangerous opioids may even be good public policy...

But it also suggests that for all our research into addiction, the money we spend, the work you and others do, our current best treatment is just more addiction. Which in turn suggests: maybe the best treatment is doing everything we can to stop use in the first place.

Ahh, more fun Orwellian language games, a specialty of the anti-prevention movement. Apparently promoting "Awareness of the damage it causes" doesn't equal stigmatizing. We are loving the sinner but hating the sin, huh?

Why do you assume I am anti prevention?

Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson · Aug 31
I think Brandon sums it up nicely. To fail to recognize that cultural cues make a huge difference to rates of drug use - that societies can successfully stigmatize - yes, stigmatize - use - is inherently an anti-prevention position.

Glad to see you call prescribed opioid substitution what it is rather than the preferred Orwellian term. People I trust do seem to think it is the one and only part of "harm reduction" that actually works, so it would be nice to be honest about it...

Just read some of your anti-marijuana book, complete bullshit. Cherry picking assholes like you are pathetically attempting to halt the progress of cannabis, but you don't stand a fucking chance, you douchebag. Watch as dispensary after dispensary opens and state after state legalizes. Here's a fun fact, cannabis is used to get people OFF of opioids, some information that's easily verifiable. You and ticker Carlson are perfect for each other, two moronic dildos attempting to gaslight the dumbest amongst us. Keep plugging along, lil guy, and we'll Opioid substitution treatment is a far better representation of harm reduction. Popcorn lung due to vaping is largely an urban myth.

Glad to see you call prescribed opioid substitution what it is rather than the preferred Orwellian term. People I trust do seem to think it is the one and only part of "harm reduction" that actually works, so it would be nice to be honest about it...

Instead of calling it "medication assisted treatment" like it's chemo or something. Giving opioid addicts a less dangerous and maybe less euphoric opioid in the hopes they'll avoid more dangerous opioids may even be good public policy...

Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson · Aug 31
But it also suggests that for all our research into addiction, the money we spend, the work you and others do, our current best treatment is just more addiction. Which in turn suggests: maybe the best treatment is doing everything we can to stop use in the first place.

I think Brandon sums it up nicely. To fail to recognize that cultural cues make a huge difference to rates of drug use - that societies can successfully stigmatize - yes, stigmatize - use - is inherently an anti-prevention position.

Sure enough, flower cannabis of 20-25% THC is easy to find at dispensaries now. However, if your THC tolerance has grown with your use (let's not say addiction, peeps, addiction is such an ugly word), you can move on to extracts that are nearly pure THC.

I think this is why we see more psychosis and violence--the concentrations are so much more. It's not the 60s hippie weed. The EU study recently showed as THC levels rise, psychosis and violence rise and their THC concentrations were much lower in the study than we have here.

This X1000. I remember Bill Keller writing for @NYTmag about the risk of a nuclear attack. We overestimated our enemies. They underestimated us. And maybe we underestimated - for better AND worse - what we would sacrifice to stop another major attack on US soil. @CaseyMattox_

I think the part people who didn't live through 9/11 may have a harder time appreciating is the feeling that it wouldn't end there. The rumors and expectations of more imminent attacks for days.

I remember a stolen fuel truck in Alabama.

This is typical - a woman with a previous DUI gets a 10-year sentence for killing two people, including a five-year-old. Read these cases and the US doesn't seem to have a mass incarceration problem as much as a mass violence (and mass consequences of substance abuse) problem.

Yes, exceptions exist (though they cut both ways) - but at least to my American eyes serving 13-14 years in prison (the average) for murder seems fair. I admire @JohnFPfaff for being intellectually honest about this but I don't know how he can say sentences are far too light.

Alcohol, tobacco, and gambling companies make plenty of money selling products that destroy some users; and ultimately cannabis companies may too (right or wrong, we like our pleasures, even if they swallow some of us whole)...

But for the @DrugPolicyOrg et al, cannabis is religion - and legalization is the first step towards decriminalization of all drugs. So they simply will not accept the truth about the science, and if the industry isn't careful their propaganda will cause massive public blowback.

Gender differences in participation were examined across four Twitter chats for social studies teachers. Analyses drawing on mixed methods revealed that [redacted] was parity across most kinds of tweets participants identified as men were more likely to use the examined Twitter chats to share resources, give advice, boast, promote their own blog/resource/website, and offer critique to another participants' tweet. National support >65% means legalization is inevitable. <55%, not so much...

Remember, the polls tend to overstate support for full legalization somewhat: in 2016 in Massachusetts, the final seven polls showed legalization winning by about 14 points on average. It won by 7, in a state Hillary Clinton won by 28.

I quote CMA: "not using cannabis is still best way to protect your health (unless you use with a medical recommendation)". CMA says "lack of evidence on risks and benefits of use make it difficult for physicians to properly advise patients." In sum, CMA position is risible.

A small case. Not a mass shooting, not even a murder, "just" attempted. This is likely all the media attention it will get.

And marijuana is only mentioned once. But read the article carefully and it screams cannabis psychosis:

And by the way US rates of maternal prenatal alcohol use appear to have fallen sharply during the 1990s/2000s as warnings - and societal stigma - spread. This is nothing but one of the great public health wins of the last generation. Cultures can change, under the right pressure.

Yep, warning pregnant women about the risks of drinking can backfire! If by backfire you mean convince them to drink less and have fewer very low-birth-weight and preterm babies (both good markers for fetal alcohol syndrome).

And by the way US rates of maternal prenatal alcohol use appear to have fallen sharply during the 1990s/2000s as warnings - and societal stigma - spread. This is nothing but one of the great public health wins of the last generation. Cultures can change, under the right pressure.

And one last fun fact: warning labels aren't even considered "punitive" measures in the research. They're "supportive," because giving people information that can help them make healthier decisions supports them.

Say wha? The @washingtonpost has connected cannabis, mental illness, and violence? In an article? That Washington Post? Something very strange is happening. (Don't worry. I won't tell @_cingraham and the other journo-children if you don't. Let's not scare them.)

I aved Bhutto, a caregiver to mentally disabled adults, got home from work about 11 that morning with bags of groceries in his Toyota Corolla. After his overnight shift at a residential facility, he had stopped in a supermarket with a list from his wife. In the parking lot of the small condo complex where the couple lived, he stepped out of his car in the chill March air, opened the trunk and reached for his bundles.

A man identified by D.C. police as Hilman Jordan — who had killed before for no sane

Condos. In Southeast Washington, the two were barely acquainted. Bhutto, a few days shy of his 64th birthday, was a former philosophy professor in Pakistan who found a new career in his adopted country: working in group homes. Jordan, 45, acquitted by reason of insanity in an unprovoked fatal shooting in 1998, had been released from St. Elizabeths Hospital and was renting a condo largely at taxpayer expense.

The first slug whizzed past Bhutto, striking the Toyota, and he spun around against, holding up his hands. The attacker tried to squeeze off another round, but the Smith & Wesson .40-caliber, wasn't also required to warn City View residents that he was a St. Elizabeths outpatient with a homicidal history. And echoing others, she questions why Jordan was allowed to remain free despite what neighbors say was his chronic pot smoking — a trigger for his psychotic delusions and a violation of his court-approved release terms.

After Bhutto was shot to death March 1, detectives say, they saw Jordan sitting calmly on his balcony overlooking the crime scene, his right shoe stained with blood. They say they found a 9mm Smith & Wesson and a substance

No mention of the 250K people who have died directly from the opioid epidemic in the US in the past 20 years. To say cannabis cannot in some form be used as a medicine is utter pseudoscience.

Funny you mention opioids. Guess what two countries have by far the worst opioid epidemics? If you said the US and Canada, you're right! And guess what two countries also have by far the most cannabis use? Not the model Ireland should follow.

Another brick in the wall of evidence on cannabis and mental illness. What's so striking about this is that the researchers expected exactly the opposite - "we thought we'd find a reduction... and quite to the contrary we found an increase."

Mizrahi, the paper's senior author, said in an interview. "And in the past we have found an elevation of TSPO in depression and OCD (obsessive-compulsive disorder) as well as in Alzheimer's," said Mizrahi, head of the centre's Focus on Youth Psychosis Prevention Clinic.

The study looked at about 60 subjects with a median age of 23, about 24 of whom where longtime cannabis users and the rest abstainers. It was published Wednesday in the journal JAMA Psychiatry.

Mizrahi and her team had believed that pot users would have significantly less inflammation than the abstainers.

"In general, people who use cannabis use it as

When the Cure Is Worse Than the Disease

In an effort to reduce opioid addiction, doctors are cutting back on pain medication — and sometimes leaving patients to suffer.

Lots of drugs are more physically addictive than cannabis. But no other drug - not cocaine, not heroin, not alcohol - makes users so proud to tell people they are addicts, that they build their lives around getting high. The phenomenon would be fascinating if it weren't so sad.

The latter which u referred to above is a massive red flag that cannabis is not for you. I think 75% of people with cannabis psychosis for more 48 hours had a psychotic disorder within 8 years, which is a astronomically high conversion. I support some form of legalization btw.

Genuine question, is there any studies linking use starting at 21 and older and a psychotic disorder? I mean for a male after 22, 23 schizophrenia diagnoses are pretty rare. Maybe a 23 age limit?

Alex Berenson
@AlexBerenson

Replying to

A very good question and the answer is I don't know of any - there is clear evidence that adults with a diagnosis of cannabis-induced psychosis are quite likely to progress to schizophrenia over time, but even those studies don't show the age of initiation (as far as I know).

But I would also note there's a good study (cited in the book) that new psychosis diagnoses post-30 (but pre-dementia) are more frequent than people think. It may be that people are subclinical for a while and then progress - from drugs, stress, or just the disease.

They do a tremendous disservice to users, i thought ur point on Marshall project about delaying use to 20's was obvious yet they couldn't even say that. Also I think we should point out that psychosis that goes beyond intoxication 1 hr vs 24 is a HUGE difference.

That's pretty disingenuous of you, Mr. Angell. When donors & mental health advocates receive messages like these both in person & in their inboxes, you can understand the desire to keep anonymous. The pro-pot party has largely used aggressive mob tactics to try & quiet the masses

Agreed with your point, but I have a hypothesis about THC metabolites being dysphoric in effect in high serum levels that comes with chronic usage and perhaps even a balancing act ingesting more THC to counteract the dysphoric effects of metabolites in some chronic consumers.

Tom Folan @tomfolanmd · 16h
Interesting hypothesis. The effect may come from receptor downregulation which we know occurs from chronic use.

3/ Now Dr. Hamblin wants a "reckoning." He wants the executives who sold and profited from those pills, who made careers from these pills, not just shamed, but jailed. "There could be consequences—short of capital punishment, but beyond surrendering profits..."

4/ So here's my question, Dr. Hamblin: What about a journalist who made a career advocating use of these pills? Whose words are indistinguishable (I challenge you to take my poll) from those the chairman of Purdue Pharma? What should we do with such a journalist?

This reckoning can't exempt journalists.

I wouldn't have used the language that I used 15 years ago now. But the facts remain the same: 80% of people who start misusing prescription opioids don't have a prescription for them & cracking down on docs DID lead to drug switching & a fentanyl epidemic.

I'm new to taking opioids and dont know Maia's past. Would you share examples?

15 yrs ago it was known there was potential for abuse. But the question then was: what's worse, suffering or addiction? OD risk didn't enter the analysis till later, & only then due to heroin/fentanyl

Patrick Byrne @AmericanByrne · Sep 6

Also I guess I could take your poll but I'd rather read the literature. [redacted] was right in her 2004 Slate article (and it's still true today), the rate of developing abuse/addiction after exposure to opioids is very low. Estimates range from 1-10%, with most on the lower end.

Well said Jean. The problem with Berenson's argument is that he hates cannabis and hasn't a good word to say about it. Once that's your starting point the bias against the drug deepens. I recognise cannabis can be harmful but I try to be honest about those harms.

For those of you who don't want to wade through a thread, a one-screen take on the @Fahrenthold @EricTrump contremps, and why, like it or not, Eric Trump is more right than the great and good of journalism want to admit. But what do I know? I never broke anything...

> It's not illegal - though he is opening himself to liability if the documents that come in are legally protected, like health records. But it is on the very edge ethically. Making blind approaches to people you have reason to believe might have information is okay, but a scattershot blind approach is dubious. And actively encouraging someone you don't know to leak is even more dubious.
> And I was always conscious as a reporter of the power imbalance in approaching ordinary people (as opposed to lawyers or CEOs or flacks who will immediately have their guard up). I tried to put my cards on the table as soon as possible. I mean, sometimes you have to slowplay things a bit, but it's best to let people know where you are going so they don't feel misled.

Okay, let's think about this for, oh, five seconds. Say teens can't access the legal market - that dispensaries enforce the rules. Whatever will they do? I dunno, maybe buy from the same adult dealers they've always used - dealers who now have access to cheap legal cannabis.

So - using the best comparison - 12/13 for CO + WA, 13/14 for OR + AK (and this is not cherry-picking, using 12/13 data for all four states would help me) - we see use fell 2.0% in CO, 0.9% in WA, and 0.3% in AK but rose 0.2% in OR - 0.75% in all, the same as the US change...

But even this is not quite right. The legal states had a higher base rate BEFORE legalization, so we should compare the 0.75% change to their base rate. We find use fell about 8% in those states, but it fell 10% in the US. Are you still with me? I know math and logic can be hard.

An important point is that youth use of all other illicit substances has been and continued to trend down, with exception of e cigs AND CANNABIS. So in this instance "no change" in use must still at least raise questions of a negative (vs no) impact.

So, at least you will admit it was completely false when you shared that youth use was increasing. Not sure why we would trust you now when you seem to throw all credibility out the window with that choice. Just like your boss Trump to lie and make it up!

This is quite the thread, from a pro-legalization cannabis investor. (I think the psychosis/DUI issues were already having an impact, but he's right -the vaping deaths are a huge problem for the industry, in part bc they will wake parents to what cannabis really is now.)

> Matthew Greenberg @greenycapital
> bostonglobe.com/news/marijuana… this is an absolute disaster in the making for the emerging cannabis industry. In this thread, I'm going to touch on why this scares me so much as an advocate for legalization, and especially as an investor in the sector. (1/n)

It's odd how what seem to me to be pretty modest claims — that both the purported medical benefits and the risks of cannabis use are not well-understood, and that there is good reason to be cautious about heavily promoting its medical and recreational use — inspire such vitriol.

The "80 % of heroin users" is a misreading of the data. For one year, 80% of HEROIN INITIATES in that year reported in a survey starting with pharma. Far smaller number than 80% of heroin users. Moreover, the figures dropped substantially after that, even for initiates.

Yep. Same with my son. When they say heroin started with pills they left out the 3+other drugs (alcohol, marijuana, cocaine) etc. that came before the pills.

In fact that rule should apply to all drugs (though far more relevant to cannabis than others) with a very limited Romeo + Juliet exemption. The analogy is apt - we agree that younger teens cannot consent to sex; how can they consent to drug use, which is generally riskier?

The conclusions definitely are more restrained. We are following up with additional behavioural studies! I can send the paper if you can't access it! The goal was to assess whether the findings after acute IV exposure in humans were also observed in naive rodents!

Glad to see you are looking at this - hope you don't mind if I follow up! I am struck by the fact the findings surprised you - like the Toronto researchers last week who expected less inflammation in the brains of users and instead found more.

The latest cannabis-and-moms propaganda from @parentsmagazine is criminal.

And I mean it shows criminal behavior - the picture of the mom baking THC edibles in HER KITCHEN WITH HER CHILDREN BESIDE HER is probably illegal even in a cannabis-legal state.

Sure. Here's the Texas data from 2018, released earlier this year. The Florida and Arizona reports are similar. (Most states do not offer as much detail, but TX/FL/AZ combined have 1/6 the US population and there is no reason to believe they are outliers.)

During the review of confirmed child fatalities, cases were reviewed for a documented history of substance abuse (including inappropriate use of prescribed medications) and for active concerns for substance abuse at the time of the child fatality.

For FY2018, 138 of the 211 child fatalities caused by abuse or neglect involved a parent or caregiver actively using a substance and/or under the influence of at least one substance that affected the ability to care for the child. In the tables and chart below, the substance abuse is described by type and if it was reported. Marijuana was the substance most identified as actively being used by the perpetrator (85 cases) in child abuse and neglect-related fatalities. In 21 child fatalities, methamphetamines and amphetamines were being actively used by the caregiver.

Table 5. Confirmed Child Abuse or Neglect Fatality by Co-Occurring Substance Abuse by Perpetrator – FY2018

Co-Occurring Substances	Active	Past History

This shows MJ common drug among 138 "child fatalities caused by abuse/neglect" involving parent/caregiver "actively using." But your tweet spoke of "30-40% of all the child deaths" in US. I surmise you meant just abuse/neglect deaths; is there data on, eg, juve car/gun deaths?

These are deaths where the parents/caregivers (usually) were found responsible. The manner of death is only partly relevant. Some gun/car deaths will count; others won't. Drownings are similar. But if a child dies of cancer, for example, the case wouldn't be included.

And yes, you are correct - I meant deaths where a parent or caregiver or other adult with responsibility was found to be at fault in some way - I thought that was obvious from the context, but if it wasn't I'm sorry.

No problem, I just wondered what supported your initial broad claim that "state data shows that cannabis users account for 30-40% of all the child deaths in the United States." Data is still notable (though, interestingly, from non-full-legalization states).

To be fair this was a NYT event and Alex is a former NYT journalist and bestselling author. While many in the industry don't agree with his viewpoint, he is an anti-legalization thought leader and we as a society benefit from a pluralistic discussion of dissenting viewpoints.

Sorry let me clarify this by saying I have no qualms with you speaking at an event, but your book is filled with a lot of bullshit and is heavily slanted by your disclosed anti-cannabis bias. I do however think it's important to have balance and cannabis is not without downside.

Why?

As long as the kids don't get any this would be a perfectly good teachable moment to teach them that some things they can't eat and why they can't have them?

Keeping it a secret from them is going to make them want them more. It'll make it a "special grown up thing".

Keith Humphreys, national treasure. Non-ideological and unafraid to ask uncomfortable questions - and to admit when we don't have the answers or when there may be no good answer.

(I'll bet he wishes I wouldn't say it; praise from me can't help his brand.)

If impeachment happens it will happen with shocking speed; lots of Republican senators want to be President. They can't run against Trump, but they can against Pence. And they need to move fast if they want to have a chance.

In Canada: a terrible and unmistakable case of cannabis-psychosis- homicide. Kudos to @edmontonjournal for explaining so clearly. One awful irony that pops up in these cases sometimes - families telling the psychotic person to use more cannabis to "relax."

This is a crucial issue; it is how journalist-advocates like [illegible] have framed the opioid crisis. Considerable evidence suggests otherwise, though. I would love to go into detail - unfortunately I have to get back to work. But thanks for the thoughtful and calm discussion...

ELSEVIER

Acute cardiovascular fatalities following cannabis use

Liliana Bachs*, Henning Mørland

Abstract

We report six cases of possible acute cardiovascular death in young adults, where very recent cannabis ingestion was documented by the presence of tetrahydrocannabinol (THC) in postmortem blood samples. A broad toxicological blood analysis could not reveal other drugs. Similar cases have been reported in the literature, but the toxicological analysis has been absent or limited to urine samples, which represent a much broader time window for cannabis intake. This paper presents six case reports, where cannabis alone was detected in blood. Further, an overview over previously published cases, clinical trials and possible pathophysiological mechanisms are presented. © 2001 Elsevier Science Ireland Ltd. All rights reserved.

Keywords: Cannabis; Driving; Tetrahydrocannabinol; Cardiovascular

1. Introduction

Different preparations of the plant Cannabis sativa are widely used around the world for their euphoric effects, making cannabis the most frequent drug of abuse, second only to alcohol in the western world. The most commonly used preparations are marijuana and hashish, which in this paper will be referred to as cannabis. Cannabis toxicity is regarded to be low [1]. By extrapolations from animal experiments, the ratio of lethal to effective intoxicating dose is estimated to be of the order of thousands to one [2]. Acute cannabis toxicity is briefly, if at all, mentioned in comprehensive textbooks about drug abuse. However, several case reports of both coronary and cerebral ischaemia related to cannabis intake have been published, since the seventies [3–11]. Many studies reported in the literature lack the determinations of tetrahydrocannabinol (THC) or THC metabolites in blood, actually demonstrating the recent intake of cannabis.

After smoking a "regular" dose of cannabis (usually containing about 20 mg THC), blood concentration of THC rises quickly and reaches peak levels before the end of the smoking period. The immediate distribution from blood to tissues is also fast and blood THC levels quickly drop to <10% within 2 h. As a consequence, THC can only be detected in blood by standard methods, depending on dose and analytical cut-off, for 4–12 h after intake. Subjective feeling of euphoria is associated with whole blood levels from 2 μg/l and higher. Whole blood levels 1 h after smoking 20–25 mg THC will typically be in the range 5–10 μg/l [9].

2. Case reports

2.1. Case 1

A 34-year-old male was found dead sitting in his living room with the TV set on. He did not have any previous record of heart disease, but had a recent sick leave from his job as a fisherman because of shoulder pain. On the day of his death, a co-worker had driven him home from work, because of worsening of his shoulder pain. The autopsy revealed findings compatible with cardiac and a recent heart infarction as well as hypertrophied heart. There was widespread atherosclerosis in the coronary arteries and aorta. No information about use of drugs or abuse was available. Toxicological analyses revealed 22 μg/l THC in whole blood and the presence of THC acid in urine. No other drugs or alcohol were found.

2.2. Case 2

The exceptions are usually intrafamilial, as in this case. Btw - I am not saying the victim/family wishes should necessarily be respected - that's why we have a system of third-party justice - but to say victims don't want punitive sentences strikes me as usually wrong.

So I won't joke about the fact this guy has a brain tumor, but it's cannabis that puts him in the hospital! That would be in bad taste. Know what else is in bad taste? Pretending THC is anything but a recreational drug. We would never tell this poor guy to drink vodka all day...

Medical Marijuana Miscalculation

September 12, 2019

A 52-year-old man who had received treatment for anaplastic astrocytoma presented to the ED with acute delirium and garbled speech. The initial workup identified no clear cause. It was then learned that he had been using a highly concentrated formulation of liquid marijuana at home, with 10 to 20 times the recommended dose of tetrahydrocannabinol per 0.1 ml of fluid.

Hey, friend, you have cancer? I'm prescribing - I mean "authorizing" - one shot every hour or PRN. Your awareness of your tumor will definitely decrease. Consult your local bartender for the best "strain." I recommend a bourbon-tequila blend.

I'm saying WHEN victims don't want punitiveness, suddenly they don't matter. Gov. Hutchinson, for ex, would only met w families that wanted executions, refused to talk to those opposed.

And given that Common Justice handles homicides, victims have complex views EVEN w homicide.

For what it's worth I tend to agree that we should listen more closely in cases of victims who want LIGHTER punishment - philosophically, we can't mete out strict punishments simply bc victims would prefer them, but we can respond to their desires in cases they don't.

Respectfully, I don't think that is what [redacted] was saying. I read him to say that severe sentences don't help victims heal, which is a documented fact. And that imposing these penalties can be about prosecutors scoring political points at the victims' expense.

We should ask John. But certainly some other folks who jumped in (and launched ad hominem attacks on me) are arguing many/most victims want leniency. And that just doesn't comport with reality as I've seen it. (As for what helps healing in the long run, I don't claim to know.)

victim/family wishes should necessarily be respected - that's why we have a system of third-party justice - but to say victims don't want punitive sentences strikes me as usually wrong.

"It's natural." What being a parent of a child with worsening cannabis addiction and psychosis in a cannabis-legal state looks like:

Alex,

My wife and I are dealing with this, and son has developed a psychological problem with his continued use of marijuana and wax. We are not equipped to deal with this problem and do not really know what to do. We have been told to call the cops and get him 5150'd or when he is sober to take him into a mental health place. The problem is that he is 24 years old and he won't voluntarily commit himself and he can hold it together when the cops show up. We live in California and it's so liberal in the ideology that weed doesn't affect people that bad, but we are living this nightmare. My wife and I don't know what to do with him. Please give me advice on what to do.

diagnosed with any mental health issues. He was diagnosed with a learning disability in Middle school. As he progressed into high school he did get into trouble with the law. He was accused of transporting drugs as a mule in school. He got in trouble for breaking and entering . Some other things that I can't remember at the moment. But all the trouble he got into was marijuana related. He cannot hold a job, he has strained relationships with family members. A lot of it has to do his paranoia. He says that he smokes every day and he doesn't want to quit because he says it's "Natural ". He didn't say or do anything threatening to family, but he purchased guns and had knives. He claims that it's for self defense, which scares the heck out of me.

We actually live [redacted], we moved here about 12 years ago [redacted] just don't know what to do.

Silly me, I forgot the first page. Now, next question - will sending this list to @PunditFact be enough to put them on notice that their statement that I "relied primarily on two studies to connect pot and psychosis" is false and defamatory? Or do I have to sue them?

Even the tobacco companies - as far as I know - never had the gall to set up "independent" newspapers that "reported" on their industry while telling consumers where to buy smokes. Of course they probably assumed no serious journalist would ever take their money.

But Leafly continues to push the "only" illicit market vapes story when the CDC has clearly said no one single substance or product has been identified. Gotta protect their bread and butter.

"Most patients have reported a history of using e-cigarette products containing THC. Many patients have reported using THC and nicotine. Some have reported the use of e-cigarette products containing only nicotine." On Sept. 27, the CDC stated, "the high level of use of prefilled THC cartridges, used

The CDC is a different agency then the FDA. And I've been on the weekly press calls, Alex. The investigators are very well aware of the issues with illicit vapes and we've quoted them directly saying as such. To be fair to the FDA, it's understandable they'd take this position.

Dr. Adams - thanks. In writing the bibliography for Tell Your Children I was struck by how much of the research on the harms of cannabis is very recent - since 2002 or so. It is sadly ironic that the push to legalize has sped up even as scientists have found so much new evidence.

In other words, minors who have easy access to cannabis through a black market also have easy access to more dangerous drugs. Thanks for pointing this out.

CONCLUSIONS: Associations between early cannabis use and later drug use and abuse/dependence cannot solely be explained by common predisposing genetic or shared environmental factors. The association may

He is relying on data from Texas that relates to reports on only child ABUSE deaths. He clarified when I pressed in response to prior tweet like this, and it is disappointing to see him being sloppy and sensational with this kind of data again.

Yes, I'm going to continue to assume that - without my saying so - people are smart enough to distinguish between child deaths that are the result of abuse/neglect and deaths from disease which are clearly unrelated to parental substance use. But feel free to keep explaining.

What about deaths from firearms? from car accidents? from accidental drownings? When you say ALL child deaths, I think those are included. Is that what data clearly show? Just hoping to promote clarity and accuracy on a data point that is rightly important and of concern.

Berenson's journalistic standards need to get higher. The lack of balance in his arguments is what's causing so many people to dislike him and send him threatening messages. For everyone's sake, I wish he would adopt a more constructive communication style.

Sorry, the evidence is unequivocal: mentally ill people who commit violent crime are more likely to be using cannabis than alcohol or any other drug. And there's considerable evidence that the risk extends into the general population too.

Which part isn't true, @jduffyrice? That cannabis causes psychosis, or psychosis causes violence?

Spoiler alert: Both true.

BTW: I didn't say I knew what had happened in this case. I only do that when the causal link is indisputable from confessions, etc. But it's illustrative.

Do you know where the methodology for that estimate comes from? I'm guessing not. I can walk you through it, and then what a similar estimate for cannabis-attributable homicides would be, based on toxicology data. Spoiler alert: the cannabis figure would almost surely be higher.

I mean, I am capable of reading the methodology the CDC provides, so yeah, I do know where it comes from.
But, in this thread you are arguing that a person who committed an act of violence who was in possession of marijuana proves your thesis. 1/2

Turns out that one problem cannabis advocates have is that they have been spinning each other for so long and so well they have no idea what the raw data actually says. Which is a big reason they find Tell Your Children so painful. Easier not to know.

Replying to @Sentinel_Vaughn @davidminpdx and @jduffyrice

So you don't want to know where the number really comes from? Yeah, I figured. Spoiler alert two: the raw data tells a very different story than the one cannabis advocates have been spreading for decades.

Had THC in their blood. Here's LA County from 2014, for example (the most recent data I can find). So if we were to use the same methodology for cannabis as alcohol, we would find an even larger number of murders attributable to cannabis.

You have the toxicology from the Chinatown incident? You have access to the person's mental health history, his history of drug use etc. to be making the claim you did in this case?

No, I don't claim we overestimate alcohol homicides. The estimate is what it is. Though you didn't ask, it is based on a study >20 years ago that examined a sample of tox screens of victims. Not killers. Guess what? The same screens usually show a greater fraction of victims...

1/ I'm not going to waste my time going through the many methodological flaws in the study purporting to show that violent crime has not increased in Colorado/Washington post-legalization, or the bias the lead author demonstrated in an op-ed six months ago...

2/ Why? I don't have to.

Here's actual data on homicides and agg assaults from Colorado and Washington in 2013 (the last year before recreational dispensaries opened) and 2018, per the FBI UCR.

CO/WA: 338 murders, 21,564 assaults in '13
446 murders, 28,798 assaults in '18

Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson · 57m
3/ For those of you counting at home, that's a 32% increase in murders and - even more stunning - a 34% increase in aggravated assaults. Subtract about 8% for population in the two states to get the per-capita change - 24% and 26%. What about the US?

4/ Glad you asked.

The US had 14,196 murders and 724,000 aggravated assaults in 2013; 16,214 murders and 807,000 assaults in 2018. That's a 14% increase in murders, an 11% increase in assaults. Lop off 4% for US population growth, and the math is simple...

Put another way: since recreational dispensaries opened in 2014, murders in Colorado/Washington have risen about 2.5x as fast as the US, and serious assaults almost 4x (!) as fast...

A race to zero for cannabis companies as sales crater yet again - great news, in part because they won't have money to spend buying coverage at places like @globeandmail and the industry may finally face some real scrutiny.

Call me a purist - but I would say recurrent psychiatric hospitalizations and the associated life disruption for psychosis due to cannabis is a bad outcome whether you remain psychotic or not. Also agree on the panic attacks- most common reason for stopping.

Just a reminder that murders and aggravated assaults have risen 25% per person in Colorado and Washington since recreational dispensaries opened in 2014; murders in the US are up 11%, assaults 7%.

Or, as cannabis advocates and their pet PhDs would say, the same!

Alex -- that's insulting & presumptuous. Physician groups should listen to honest cannabis clinicians, not crime fiction writers who have been publicly criticized by dozens of doctors, academics and members of the NASEM for distorting the truth & cherry-picking...for shame.

Actually Ellen already provided a link to the most important meta-analysis. "The risk for homicide was increased in individuals with psychosis... OR = 19.5." Why would you imagine I would ever make a mistake on a datapoint this important? Much less make it up?

Review article

Fazel S, et al. PLoS Med. 2009.

Abstract

BACKGROUND: Although expert opinion has asserted that there is an increased risk of violence in individuals with schizophrenia and other psychoses, there is substantial heterogeneity between studies reporting risk of violence, and uncertainty over the causes of this heterogeneity. We undertook a systematic review of studies that report on associations between violence and schizophrenia and other psychoses. In addition, we conducted a systematic review of investigations that reported on risk of homicide in individuals with schizophrenia and other psychoses.

METHODS AND FINDINGS: Bibliographic databases

comorbidity. Choice of outcome measure, whether the sample was diagnosed with schizophrenia or with nonschizophrenic psychoses, study location, or study period were not significantly associated with risk estimates on subgroup or metaregression analysis. Further research is necessary to establish whether longitudinal designs were associated with lower risk estimates. The risk for homicide was increased in individuals with psychosis (with and without comorbid substance abuse) compared with general population controls (random-effects OR = 19.5, 95% CI 14.7-25.8).

CONCLUSIONS: Schizophrenia and other psychoses are associated with violence and violent offending, particularly homicide. However, most of the excess risk appears to be mediated by substance abuse comorbidity. The risk in these patients with Cannabis as a risk factor for homicide is negligible. Even with other major risk factors (e.g., history of violence, male gender, alcohol), it's extremely hard to predict.

Homicides by people with psychosis (let alone cannabis-induced psychosis) are extremely rare.

Sorry, wishing doesn't make it so. This is just untrue - people with schizophrenia account for 6-10% of all homicides, and that does not count other diagnoses (bipolar with psychosis, etc), much less people with undiagnosed prodromal symptoms.

Silly Brandon. Dr. Stea does not need to read Tell Your Children, much less any of the ~100 peer-reviewed papers it cites, because he just knows. That's known as "belief-based medicine" and it is the foundational principle of cannabinoid-centered practice.

One nice thing that happened this year is the bad marijuana book had effectively no impact on anything, despite its 15 minutes of fame, because at least some drug war hysteria is now quickly seen for what it is. A testament to some things getting better.

Final thought: the reason the nexus is so clear in this case isn't because it's unusual. It's because Melissa Putnam survived to explain exactly what happened. If Martin had killed her too, the case probably would have been pegged as just another marijuana robbery.

'Duty bound to speak': Surgeons say no to ACT cannabis laws

Kirsten Lawson — Federal Politics

SHARE COMMENTS

The Royal Australasian College of Surgeons has called for the repeal of Canberra's cannabis laws, saying they will lead to more death and injury on the road.

Mr Hunt also upped pressure on ACT Chief Minister Andrew Barr, with a spokesman saying Mr Hunt would be writing directly to Mr Barr to ask for the medical evidence he has that differs from the international literature.

"Legalising recreational cannabis is dangerous and medically irresponsible," he said. "The brief confirms the very real risks cannabis can pose to physical health and in particular, to mental health."

The federal government is collecting ammunition that could support an intervention to overturn the ACT's law before it takes effect at the end of January. Such an intervention would not be made lightly, given it would be a step-change to overturn territory laws outside issues

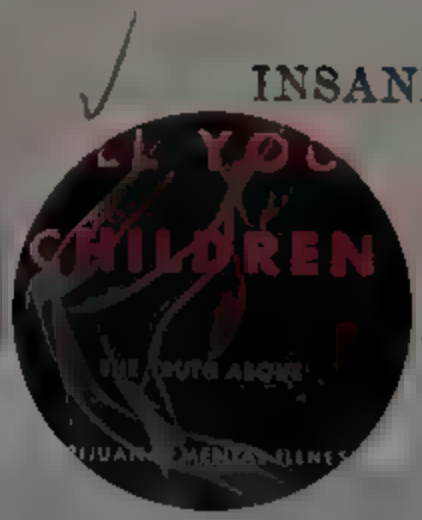
That's a huge change for a conservative state that had relatively strict rules on cannabis use. So violent crime must be way down, right? Because cannabis legalization reduces crime.



Yeah, about that...

Unfortunately the Oklahoma City PD isn't great about keeping its Compstat data up to date (the most recent numbers I can find are from March). But the city had 52 murders last year. This year it is on pace for almost 90. Another legalization win!

Didn't most full legalization states have a decline in murders from 2017 to 2018 according to new FBI data? Have you assessed what the new 2018 FBI murder data tells us?

Alex Berenson
@AlexBerenson

Replying to

The 2018 data shows that the first four to legalize showed a y-o-y drop in murders roughly equal to the US drop (so they still track far ahead of the US trend since 2013). They also showed big increases in agg assaults, which actually fell in the US - so the gap there is growing.

If the experience of the first 4 is any guide, it'll take a while for legalization to have an impact is states like CA, where loose medical rules meant the drug was quasi-legal anyway. OK is a strange case because though it didn't recreationally legalize (supposedly)...

In some ways it seems to have a bigger, faster change than any other state. 1,500 dispensary licenses in a year! And it wasn't like the drug was quasi-legal there before as in some blue states.

…breastfeeding?

There are many potential negative health effects from using marijuana and other products containing THC during pregnancy and while breastfeeding. In fact, the U.S. Surgeon General recently advised consumers that marijuana use during pregnancy may affect fetal brain development, because THC can enter the fetal brain from the mother's bloodstream. The Surgeon General also advised that marijuana may increase the risk of a newborn with low birth weight. Research also suggests increased risk for premature birth and potentially stillbirth[1].

While breastfeeding, it is important to know that breastmilk can contain THC for up to six days after use. This THC may affect a newborn's brain

Unlike a drug that works on you, you have to work a 12 Step Program. You have to WANT to put in the (considerable) effort involved. Most people don't, not until things get REALLY bad.

And you need a group of people to show you how. All with experience working those 12 steps

Normalizing and increasing cannabis use by the parents of young children kills children. That's not exaggeration or hyperbole. It is simply what the data shows. I realize you probably don't want to believe it - no one wants to believe it - but the evidence is unequivocal.

Question for my Canadian friends: Aside from cannabis legalization, what exactly were @JustinTrudeau's other policy "successes"? And isn't this election at least in part a referendum on the "progressive" drug policies that Trudeau champions?

I know at this point no one is discussing undoing legalization, but don't you think if he were winning easily (as was expected a year ago when legalization began) advocates would crow his reelection was a referendum on it? Can't have it both ways. (Unless the media lets you.)

I concede that's a social and cultural problem and agree we should advocate in families and communities for less drug use. It's just quite a leap to say that government should be the one to intervene.

The difference was obvious in the way WeedWeek and @leafly treated Tell Your Children. WeedWeek disliked it, but Alex took it seriously and had me on to talk about it. Leafly simply tried to demonize it and wished it would disappear.

This is a very common public misperception. Data from a 2016 study that examined drug enforcement evaluations in cannabis-only cases revealed that the number one traffic infraction that led to the initial stop was not driving too slow... it was speeding.

Thanks to @NoBSCannabis - I wouldn't even call him a neutral observer, since he's a proponent of medical cannabis - for declaring me the easy winner of the Yale Law debate with @Peter_Grinspoon - "this is the second time I've seen him (beat) a trained medical professional."

Smackdown: Grinspoon vs Berenson

A Debate Recap

J. Brandon Lowry
Oct 24 · 7 min read ★

A few days ago, I wrote a hype piece for a debate between two big names in the world of medical marijuana, Dr. Peter Grinspoon and Alex Berenson. You can read my full preview here, but I'll give you a a very quick overview:

And The Winner Is...

If we're speaking purely about presentation, I'm giving it to Berenson. He clearly came in with a plan, he stuck to it, and executed it well. I've heard Berenson's arguments several times and still don't find them convincing, but he definitely knows how to handle himself on a debate stage.

In terms of the content of the arguments being made... I think I (grudgingly) have to pick Berenson again. Grinspoon spent the majority of his time arguing that his opponent's book is "harmful": to minority communities, to the mentally ill, and to responsible cannabis users that cause his cause violence. Instead, Grinspoon did exactly what Berenson accused him of, attacking his character and motivations instead of sticking on the facts. This is particularly ironic, given that Grinspoon attacked Berenson for arguing in bad faith.

This is the second time I've seen Berenson take on a medical professional and come out on top. Interestingly, both were "cannabis doctors", meaning they incorporate marijuana into their practice. I doubt that Berenson's interested in doing it again, but I'd love to see him take on a schizophrenia researcher, someone who has a deep understanding of the Psychosis causes violence. Twice in 72 hours in NY, a police officer has killed an apparently deranged person after being attacked. This time the officer was badly hurt too. The more we deny the truth of mental illness and violence, the more this happens.

"Without his heroin for his headache..."

This is the logical consequence of pretending cannabis is medicine.

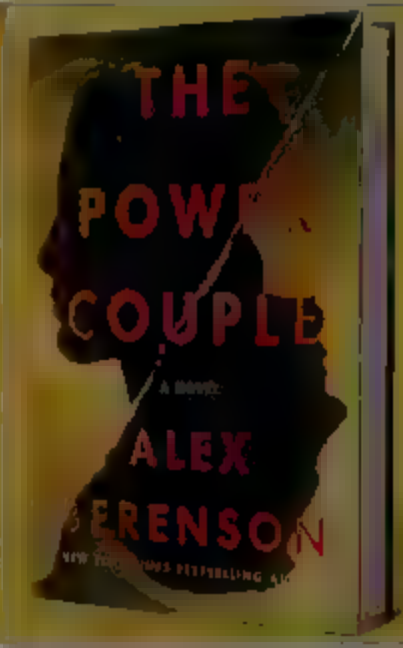
Everything that is wrong with the woke critique of the criminal justice system in one @JohnFPfaff tweet. Turns out there's no difference between "offenders" (criminals) and "victims"! Come on, John, you cannot actually believe this. It's nonsensical.

John Pfaff
@JohnFPfaff

But to accept broken windows in the street crime context but reject it (in principle, without seeing the new buildings) for the jails is to engage in the same sort of fallacious reasoning that leads us to separate "offenders" and "victims."



It's ppl. The same ppl. On both sides.

Strangely enough, I have absolutely no problem distinguishing victim and criminal (or should I say "victim" and "offender"?) in the 3-5 child murders the US sees every day.

Strangely enough, your decision to highlight a crime that amounts to .000001% of daily arrests (actually) in response to a tweet about broken windows policing is everything that is wrong with the deliberately obtuse anti-woke-ism of the "I do reason" centrists.

Then there is no need to police or punish at all. The street will sort it out for all of us. If the infant scalded to death and the father who scalds her are the same, then language (and justice) have no meaning. Maybe that's where they think we are. I disagree.

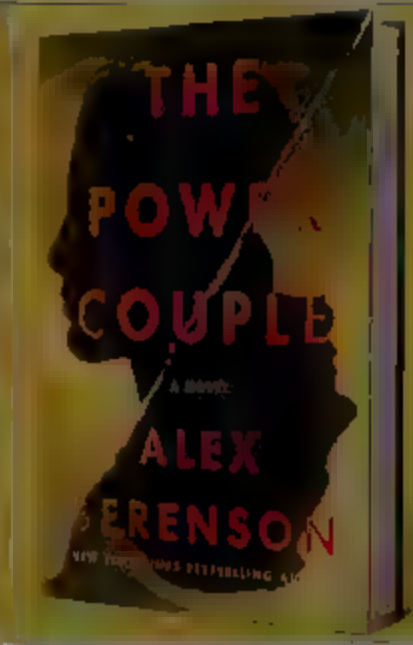
Today's case of cannabis and child murder:



"Without marijuana to calm him, Heath grew more enraged over a soiled diaper, [a prosecutor said]..."

I can't begin to unpack that sentence. Swap any other drug for "marijuana" there, the absurdity leaps out...

Meanwhile, in Australia: Cannabis (plus methamphetamine in this case) causes (and worsens) psychosis. Psychosis causes violence.

Extra points for my woke friends if they can explain how the victim in this case is "the same" as the man who killed him.

wrote 'why are we not legalising marijuana' on day of alleged murders

He praised his mum's strength on his blog as well.

22-year-old Gabriel Lien Goh allegedly stabbed his 56-year-old mother out of anger, and punched his 90-year-old maternal grandmother to death.

He was arrested on the same day, and charged with murder the next day on Oct. 28.

So why aren't we saying legalization has failed? At least on basically every measure of public health we can track, every measure that legalizers promised would improve.

So let's think this through: maybe it's NOT that people get addicted because of childhood trauma...

1/ Glad @germanlopez is looking at this issue. I notice he doesn't have any problem finding lots of parents who are desperately committed to helping their opioid-addicted kids.

So let's think this through: maybe it's NOT that people get addicted because of childhood trauma...

> German Lopez @germanlopez
> I have a new story in my series on drug addiction treatment out today. It's about a mother who lost her son to a heroin overdose, then struggled to pay for treatment for her daughter.

2/ Maybe the "Rat Park" theory is mostly - if not almost completely - wrong. Maybe some drugs are just so dangerous that they'll suck down lots of people exposed to them, and so the key is limiting exposure, not "harm reduction" or any other back-end efforts.

Huh. Interesting.

This young man got all (allegedly) murderous with his lady friend after "they began smoking marijuana he believed was laced with methamphetamine..."

Here's a hint: it was laced. With THC.

Then he strangled her. But cannabis never causes violence, right?

Yeah, that's not the biggest of the cannabis industry's many problems - the biggest problem is that the product causes or worsens mental illnesses in many of its heaviest users - but it's top five.

One of the simplest, most insidious bits of propaganda Psychosis Inc. uses to flog its product: "Dispensary."

Liquor stores aren't hospitals. Cannabis stores aren't dispensaries. They're cannabis stores.

Honest media outlets should call them that.

I'm not holding my breath.

Don't fall for studies by cannabis-loving academics that try to make the raw data go away, either. Look at the figures for yourself. The increase is especially notable in cities like Denver, which has had almost as many murders since July as it did in all of 2013. True story.

German Lopez @germanrlopez

One nice thing that happened this year is the bad marijuana book had effectively no impact on anything, despite its 15 minutes of fame, because at least some drug war hysteria is now quickly seen for what it is. A testament to some things getting better.

2/ To review:

"He smoked marijuana earlier in the day... and felt afterward that someone was going to kill him."

So he stabbed his girlfriend to death. Then he (allegedly) told a police officer, "I think I killed her. She's the devil."

Do we need a neon sign?

1/ No wonder folks are confused. Even when the cannabis-psychosis-violence link is THIS obvious both sides deny it.

The defendant says the cannabis was laced. (Nope.)
The prosecution says he killed her because she was breaking up with him. (Nope.)

When people learn the facts about the psychiatric risks - and put friends' and their own negative experiences with cannabis in context and realize how common problems can be - their view of legalization turns upside down.

(And thanks to the students for such great questions!)

Assuming this is true, "seizure" and "medical emergency" may be a euphemism for something more, erm, psychiatric. Honesty here about what happened might make a meaningful difference, but it's unlikely, and HIPAA means we will probably not know the truth unless Waiters tells us.

Caveat- the biggest conclusion here is that we need more research on long term effects, BUT it's important we recognize vaping isn't as "safe" as some suggest- especially for youth initiates.

Dr. Adams - do you know if anyone has done this study with people who vape THC alone? Given that cannabis is a known factor in cardiac events, I would think it's overdue...

Great question bro! Love the way you call it reform when you mean recreational legalization, too. Lucky us, the Washington state DOT looked at that very question and came up with a handy-dandy chart. Don't worry, I'm sure @benconomics will be happy to tell us why it's wrong.

1/ And this hardly needs to be said, but for three adults - including the mother - to collaborate in the abuse of a child is behavior that almost never happens in the absence of drug use. But THC is a terrible drug for the caregivers of young kids...

Even when it doesn't cause paranoia, it dissociates, blunts emotion, and enhances sensation (these three tortured the boy in low-grade ways for their own amusement) - and, oh yeah, makes users lazy. Hard to imagine a more toxic combination. Yet media outlets promote parental use.

Had a reader question about Chasing The Scream, by @johannhari101. Thought you might be interested in the answer:

this I mean both large parts of it are counterfactual, in that they use secondary and tertiary sources or clever writing tricks to present a narrative that is inaccurate to the point of being fictional in spots (the international effort to make cannabis and other drugs illegal long predates Harry Anslinger, for example; overdose deaths in Vancouver have soared in the last decade; the Rat Park study has been repeatedly discredited), and that Hari uses the narrative he creates to argue in favor of widespread drug decriminalization/legalization, which would without question be a public health disaster.

The War on Drugs is deeply problematic, but drugs like cocaine and heroin are not dangerous because they are illegal: they are illegal because they are dangerous. Their dangers became obvious within a couple of decades after they first became widely available in the late 1800s, and neither human biology nor the drugs themselves have changed since. They produce high rates of addiction, high dangerous opioids and hoping they won't overdose). Addicts also tend to be extremely damaging to the people around the users and to society generally; it should be obvious that a society that consisted only or mostly of addicts would collapse almost immediately, and I suspect the tipping point is a lot lower than people realize - the United States has seen huge negative consequences from the opioid epidemic even though fewer than 1 percent of the population is addicted.

Cannabis is a marginal case, because it is more comparable to alcohol in terms of its overall harms (less physically dangerous, more psychiatrically harmful), but even in the case of cannabis, legalization appears to be producing measurable negative public health effects and no benefits except to the industry.

Best

I'll also say that Johann's checkered (talk about a euphemism) history as a journalist makes his behavior as an author totally unsurprising; I'd urge anyone who takes him seriously as a writer of nonfiction to read this (to take just one example):

A math problem for @germanlopez: if this hour-long talk I gave on the risks of cannabis has been seen more than a quarter-million times, and over half the views came since this post a month ago, how many minutes of fame does Tell Your Children have left?

German Lopez
@germanlopez

One nice thing that happened this year is the bad marijuana book had effectively no impact on anything, despite its 15 minutes of fame, because at least some drug war hysteria is now quickly seen for what it is. A testament to some things getting better.

Why is it so hard for @npr or @newyorker or @washingtonpost to run a piece like this? Obviously, I'd like to see even more emphasis on problems, but this at least mentions them, rather than letting advocates offer an utterly mythical picture of the post-legalization landscape.

Great to see @samhsagov has looked at the evidence and will no longer allow opioid treatment clinics or mental health centers from spending federal money on "medical" cannabis for patients.

In other news, gasoline will no longer be used to fight fires.

So local reporting is following national reporting and becoming openly politically motivated (with the left leading, I suppose, because non-profit funding skews to the left). Given the crisis in funding smaller papers, I guess biased local news beats no local news. I guess.

COURIER @CourierNewsroom
Today, we're announcing the launch of @CourierNewsroom, a progressive digital-first local media company dedicated to growing local reporting infrastructure across the country.

New @US_FDA warning on CBD - the gov't is finally pushing back on mythmaking from Psychosis Inc. and its cousin Placebo Inc.

Best line: "We are also investigating reports of CBD [with] unsafe levels of contaminants (e.g., pesticides, heavy metals, THC)."

So when do the warnings from @Surgeon_General @CDCgov @US_FDA @samhsagov et al prompt any reflection in the journo-children who have pushed cannabis legalization as a cost-free road to Narnia? Maybe @_cingraham can tell us. (Oh, wait, he got tired of the truth and blocked me.)

Far from the worst case of cannabis-inspired child abuse, but maybe the oddest. And a reminder that @washingtonpost shilling aside, THC is contraindicated for parenting - 30-40% of child abuse/neglect deaths occur at the hands of heavy cannabis users or people using at the time.

1/ A partial list of things that don't cure cancer:

Cannabis.
Prayer.
Hugging puppies.
Positive thinking.
THC.
Chelation.
Starvation diets.
Essential oils.
The Secret.
CBD.

Look, cancer is awful (my family is dealing with it right now)...

2/ But the effort to promote cannabis or THC or CBD as a cure is the height of absurdity and cynicism (it seems to be bigger in the UK than the US, probably because cannabis promoters are more sophisticated in the US and have moved past techniques this crude)...

3/ And, as usual, the media has abetted this nonsense by failing to ask basic questions of the people making these claims. Real harm is being done here, not just because these claims confuse people about the fact that cannabis is an intoxicant first and foremost...

Two countries have fully legalized cannabis. Both had elections this fall. In Canada, Justin Trudeau lost his majority. In Uruguay, with crime spiking, the legalization government lost power for the first time in 15 years.

Yep, voters love legalization.

In Canada last week, a newspaper (accurately) reported that a man had pled guilty to beheading his father while suffering cannabis psychosis. You'll never beeeelieve what happened next! (Not that cannabis users want to intimidate people who discuss the psychiatric risks of THC.)

Cannabis doesn't produce any political ideology (except greed, as everyone from @SpeakerBoehner to @JohnMorganESQ can attest).

However, it does cause psychosis.

This ugly U.K. case just ended in an NGRI verdict; the killer believed he was hunting pedophiles when he randomly killed three 80-something men. Guess what drug he was seeking during the spree? Here's a hint: the same one he used during his decade-long decline into schizophrenia.

custody with bail conditions not to visit farmland in the area without being seen by a mental health nurse.

At around 11am Lewis-Ranwell then hailed a taxi driver to take him to Haldon Hill in Exeter and handed over a 100 Euro note as payment.

The driver Johnson Joseph said in a statement read to the jury: 'He made me feel very scared. He came across as some sort of mental health patient.'

He added that the defendant sat in the passenger seat and asked him where he could buy marijuana

The cab driver said he did not know and the pair then shared a journey for about 30 minutes during BTW: if you wonder why cannabis-psychosis-violence cases seem to happen more in Canada and the UK than the US, they don't. They're just reported better; with fewer murders, reporters can follow cases and testimony more closely, and they fear the Reefer Madness tag (a bit) less.

Such a lucky coincidence: THC gets you high and ALSO cures cancer. Of course heroin cures diabetes and bourbon reverses Alzheimer's, so maybe we shouldn't be surprised. Science!

And as for $SAVA - we desperately need more schizophrenia treatments, but it looks to me like the effect size is about 1/2 olanzapine's and the side effect profile, though different, is hardly zero from the atypicals. Not to say it's not approvable if the P3 trial confirms...

alarming.

Garcia says 25 teenagers have been charged with murder and are now being prosecuted in the adult system.

She says there are seven more teens charged with murder in the juvenile system.

Three them are just 14 years old.

"It's very disturbing. This is something we all need to be concerned about and I think what's frustrating is finding the root of the issue, how do we fix this problem?" She said.

Yes, I'm not sure US courts would go this route - the Canadian Bouchard-Lebrun ruling gives defendants there at least a chance to claim temporary drug-induced insanity (how could I have known I'd react this way?) - and thus avoid either criminal sanctions or civil confinement...

(Ultimately the Canadian Supreme Court found Bouchard-Lebrun didn't deserve insanity protection, but he'd used methamphetamine, not cannabis. If the Canadian courts don't sort this out fast, they will have a lot of people trying to claiming cannabis psychosis as a defense.)

Criminal acts due to psychosis which is caused by regular use of cannabis rather than acute intoxication is tricky stuff legally. Here is a NGRI verdict but still required monitoring. Not sure that combo could happen here in VT currently.

Science is hard. Brain science is really, really hard. Cannabis advocates use that fact to lie about the strength of the research showing THC causes psychosis. Letting them lie kills people - just as letting Big Tobacco lie about lung cancer killed people. Don't let them lie.

2/ I am now sadly familiar with the games woke academics play to hide the reality of crime, driving, and public health problems after cannabis legalization in states like Colorado. But the heart of the problem is a simple inability to face the fact that cannabis may be dangerous.

If you still think Warren or Sanders or a hard-left Democrat can beat Trump, you've been warned. The 2016 Brexit vote clearly presaged Trump's win five months later... and tonight's Conservative victory is much larger.

The Tessa Majors killing is an ugly case on several levels and I don't want to focus on it, but in the very first story about the 13-year-old suspect: "He hangs out, he smokes weed... he never seemed like a violent person."

"He just hangs out, he smokes weed, just a normal person in my eyes."

"He smokes his little weed, who doesn't nowadays?" Sears added.

" He never seemed like a violent person. ... He always seemed like a calm individual. He was a good kid. I don't know how he got involved in this.

"He should be involved in school activities, anything other than that, killing somebody or being involved in a murder."

Precisely. No biometric test for psychosis/schizophrenia exists as biology is mystery (except for 30-100 associated genes that shift with technology). D2 dopamine receptor antagonists block psychotic symptoms, block marijuana-induced psychosis: clue on biological plausibility.

A 13-year-old boy was arrested Thursday and allegedly told detectives he and two middle-school buddies robbed her before one of the boys knifed her to death, sources said. It wasn't clear what sparked the fatal knifing or whether the boys were involved in any drug deal that went down, or was supposed to.

Another youth, 14, was arrested, but ultimately released on Saturday as authorities work to bolster their case.

A third teen is still being sought, authorities have noted.

Ahh, @sullydish, a cannabis apologist without peer. Few things are more dangerous than a stylish writer who doesn't bother with facts. He writes how legalization has made DC safer; in reality the murder rate is up 60% since 2013. True story, Andrew. Not that you care.

The city legalised it five years ago, and the residents of this increasingly wealthy place have responded with gusto. I got my medical marijuana card a while back — tell them you've got HIV, and they stop asking questions — and it's a revelation. Instead of vaguely asking your weed dealer whether that baggie is full of indica (downer) or sativa (upper) strains, and not getting a very reassuring answer, you get to shop online and pick out whatever you want. There's data for every taste: the percentage of THC (the part that gets you high), of CBD (the part that relaxes your body), tips that tell you which strains help, say, insomnia or anxiety or appetite, and a whole variety of delivery methods — old-school joints, tinctures, oils, vape cartridges, and on and on. If keeping cannabis illegal drives homicides like Tessa Major's, then legalizing it should produce an immediate and sharp drop in violent crime.

Yet Colorado, Washington, and other legal states have seen the opposite.

The problem is the drug, not its legal status.

This is true. THC is far less physically and far more psychiatrically dangerous.

This high potency marijuana is much more addictive than alcohol. I saw numbers that say it's at 18% compared to alcohol at 10% and Opioids are 24%.

Agree that marijuana is far more psychiatrically dangerous than alcohol but also more physically dangerous in a number of ways. THC can stay in the system of chronic users for up to 30 days. One alcoholic drink leaves the system in an hour and a half. Huge difference.

Precisely. No biometric test for psychosis/schizophrenia exists as biology is mystery (except for 30-100 associated genes that shift with technology). D2 dopamine receptor antagonists block psychotic symptoms, block marijuana-induced psychosis: clue on biological plausibility.

No, the only decent counter-argument is the lack of a population-wide increase, and even that is falling apart (the genetic stuff is all over the map and so noisy it too doesn't offer much in either direction).

Another brick in the wall: a new paper from Danish researchers shows that cannabis psychosis cases more than doubled in Denmark from 2006 to 2016, and dual diagnoses with schizophrenia also increased.

Get access

First View

Annual incidence of cannabis-induced psychosis, other substance-induced psychoses and dually diagnosed schizophrenia and cannabis use disorder in Denmark from 1994 to 2016

Carsten Hjorthøj, Maria Oku Larsen

Increase in the level of tetrahydrocannabinol (THC) in cannabis has also been seen. It is currently unclear whether this has led to an increase in the incidence of cannabis-induced psychosis. We aimed to investigate (1) the development of incidence of cannabis-induced psychosis over time, compared with other substance-induced psychoses and (2) the development of incident cases of cannabis-induced psychosis over time compared with dual diagnosis defined as schizophrenia and a cannabis use disorder.

Method

Data on psychiatric diagnoses were extracted from the Danish Psychiatric Central Research Register and summarized per year as both absolute incidence (number of cases) and incidence rates per 100 000 person years.

Results

The incidence rate of cannabis-induced psychosis increased steadily from 2.9 per 100 000 person years in 2006 to 8.1 per 100 000 person years in 2016. There was a corresponding increase in dual diagnosis with schizophrenia and cannabis use disorder, but a decrease in alcohol-induced psychosis.

I present cannabis advocate and licensed physician @Peter_Grinspoon, whose approach to research is to dismiss studies he "hasn't read" if they present data he doesn't like. I believe this is known as the Ostrich Theory. (Hey, at least he's honest enough to admit it.)

Tweet

peter grinspoon @Peter_Grinspo... · 17m

These studies based on billing and diagnosis codes don't really seem to contribute much except show that people admit to #cannabis use more now, or doctors pad the billing with extra diagnoses when they do. (I haven't read this study, but the last 10 like it were waste of time..)

As I say in Tell Your Children after looking at the history of psychiatry and cannabis (and from talking to my wife, who's seen this dynamic firsthand) - psychiatry was very judgmental until the 1960s, right? A lot of the older language around sexuality and mental illness...

A strange case out of Ohio: not sure if the defense plans to plead cannabis psychosis specifically, but the details don't sound like a typical NGRI case. Count on courts seeing cannabis psychosis defenses more and more; lawyers have every reason to try it.

> Well I enjoy the hell out of these books, I am disappointed that you take the left-wing/appeaser view of Islam. A careful reading of the Quran, hadiths. And especially the book entitled " Reliance Of the traveler" which is the manual of sunni islamic law originally written in the 1300s And attested to. By among other places, Al Azhar university in Cairo to be a genuine translation. you will see that islam is not a religion of peace I like your character John Wells believes. As an intelligent man I believe if you read a history of the conflict between islam and Christianity from the early days you would understand this. They say people won't get help because of "stigma." Denial, more than stigma, is more of a reason people won't get help for substance abuse problems. People who have addiction frequently blame someone else or something else, and blaming "stigma" fits into this scheme.

"Harm reduction" types also don't like the term addiction. Why not be truthful and call the problem what it is? Denying that someone has addiction is not helping them. It's hurting them.

1.8 fatal crashes per billion miles = 2.0 fatalities. (1.1 fatality per fatal crash) In NY, that equates to 240 extra deaths each year or one [illegible] disaster each month.

Sounds right. A topline look at the numbers coming out of Colorado, Oregon, and Washington suggests they now have 300+ extra deaths a year (roughly the same combined population as NY, but more rural roads and no NYC, so more driving).

We grounded an entire fleet of airplanes worldwide for 346 deaths (and rightly) - this is about that many deaths. Per year. In three states.

Restorative justice at its finest! Drive with 12 ng/ml of THC in your blood, run over a motorcyclist, hire a good lawyer, and you pay $300 for killing another human being.

At a minimum every legalized state needs a set 5 ng/ml standard for DUI-marijuana.

That's the real reason "harm reduction" types don't like "stigma" - not because it doesn't work, but because it says drug-using behavior is outside the norm and we want to discourage and prevent it, even if our efforts are not always successful.

For example, rational would be two drug gangs fighting over a corner, or a bank robbery. Semi-rational would be a bar fight between two people who have a pre-existing disagreement. And irrational would include the classic psychosis crimes - killing a child or a stranger...

It seems clear that longer sentences, better policing, and other changes (the general decline in crack cocaine use, for example, and perhaps the rise of cell phones, which make street corner drug dealing less necessary) have decreased "rational" crime over the last 30 years...

This was Wilson's great insight - many criminals are rational and can be deterred by making the costs of crime higher (though as a society we have to decide just how high we want to make them - we could deter shoplifting if we executed shoplifters, but we don't.)

Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson · 28 Dec 2019
However, Wilson hardly deals with drugs at all in his book - (he has one chapter on heroin, but he is largely concerned with its effect on property crimes). And so I wonder if our success in dealing with rational crime has blinded us to a slow and steady rise in irrational crime.

Thanks man. I am considering another book on broader issues around decriminalization; millions of people fight tactically to clean up the mess drugs make every day, yet drug advocates have somehow seized the strategic high ground on policy...

Agreed. My point is that the libertarian case of "unavoidably causes" harm is far too simplistic. We ban drunk driving on the basis that it increases risk; it is possible to make similar judgments about the relative risks of drugs.

Article does not address the fact that suicidal ideation from marijuana use comes on quite suddenly, and families may have no clues their teen is depressed. Then they try pot. There should be toxicology screens for these suicides.

3/ There are lots of reasons for this - I won't go into them. We have better data for the victims of homicides (not other violent crimes) because, obviously, we usually have bodies. We don't do tox screens on all of them either (we probably should) but we do a fair number.

This was Wilson's great insight - many criminals are rational and can be deterred by making the costs of crime higher (though as a society we have to decide just how high we want to make them - we could deter shoplifting if we executed shoplifters, but we don't.)

However, Wilson hardly deals with drugs at all in his book - (he has one chapter on heroin, but he is largely concerned with its effect on property crimes). And so I wonder if our success in dealing with rational crime has blinded us to a slow and steady rise in irrational crime.

I am not sure about this, and I am not even sure about ways to examine it - I suppose one way would be to look at trends in NGRI pleas or trends in types of crimes - are assaults on strangers increasing, for example? But I think the question needs to be asked.

This is consistent with the NSDUH data showing that cannabis users use the drug more days a year than other drugs, including cocaine and heroin. But yes, it would be best to sample the tox reports and generate a hard number/percentage for cases with the active metabolite.

Although Ezra Klein @votdotcom put a damaging Video on the dangers of marijuana compared to alcohol, he seems to have taken it down. We complained a lot. Regardless, his video could be influence on why so many teens think driving high is harmless.

Wonder if a non-ideological criminologist out there (I know, like asking for a unicorn) who could look at long-term crime data to see if the terrible recent murder trends in high-crime cities like Philly and STL are more likely one-offs or the start of a new national increase...

What's genuinely interesting is the apparent recent rise in the frequency of these cases; I suspect it reflects both a real change - possibly from the rapid growth in the use of near-pure THC products - and because lawyers are experimenting more with quasi-NGRI defenses...

Of course, cannabis psychosis is voluntary intoxication, but when you can combine it with a schizophrenia diagnosis you may wind up with the best of both worlds (from the defense POV) - the schizophrenia gets the NGRI plea accepted...

I suspect "guilty but mentally ill" will eventually be the way we deal with this issue, but that's an uncommon verdict at the moment (I don't even think all states have it), and there may be some ugly outcomes before we get there. Would love to hear from lawyers on this...

Agreed. My point is that the libertarian case of "unavoidably causes" harm is far too simplistic. We ban drunk driving on the basis that it increases risk; it is possible to make similar judgments about the relative risks of drugs.

I am glad to see law enforcement starting to speak out, though. For a couple of years they'd seemed to take the position that since voters had approved legalization it wasn't their place to discuss the impacts.

So glad law enforcement is speaking out. Also more government officials, politicians, researchers, physicians and parents. We've had enough of this failed experiment. Time to stand up and speak the truth! Thanks for your leadership Alex!

1/ On the topic of cannabis and parenting, a recent column from @JamilahLemieux of @slate is beyond awful:

A woman writes that her husband has repeatedly left out his vape pen despite her pleas. Now her toddler's used it.

The answer: "Consider giving the THC a try yourself."

2/ Did anyone at [illegible] give a thought to this advice? Even if Jamilah's editors don't know the data linking caregiver cannabis use and child abuse/neglect deaths (and I'm sure they don't) would this attitude seem okay if dad were leaving his vodka out?

It's not surprising that crime increases when the people who are supposed to enforce the law won't do so; what's surprising is how quickly the wheels come off the wagon. But criminals - rational criminals, anyway - respond to incentives like everyone else.

4/ So we have decent data on drug/alcohol use by victims, almost none by criminals. And we know that in homicides (and other violent crimes) today's criminal may be tomorrow's victim - ask about that. This is particularly obvious in fights where both sides are armed.

However, when it comes to alcohol-attributed homicides, the actual numerical estimates are usually generated on the basis of BAC in victims - not perpetrators. This is because we don't have good national data on drug/alcohol use by criminals at the time of the crime.

In terms of cannabis, at least three of the four conditions for believing a link exist:: historical, real-world/epidemiologic, and mechanism of action (actually two - intoxication and paranoia/psychosis). The lab evidence is not as strong, but we can reasonably debate why.

So if we are going to continue to use victim data for alcohol-attributable homicides, we should probably consider doing the same for cannabis homicides (looking at the active metabolite of THC).

Dan Nguyen @dancow · Jan 10

I guess I'm being partially tendentious, or maybe overly presumptuous in thinking that in general, the victimization studies are not the primary kinds of studies people have in mind when associating alcohol use with homicides.

Background

Although the association between alcohol and homicide is well documented, there has been no recent study of alcohol involvement in homicide victimization in U.S. states. The objective of this paper was to determine the prevalence of alcohol involvement in homicide victimization and identify socio-demographic and other factors associated with alcohol involvement in homicide victimization.

Ok, link us a study doing that then. You linked a study not calculating alcohol-attributted homicides to prove they are calculated a specific way.

Alex Berenson
@AlexBerenson

Replying to

No, I linked to a study doing exactly that:

> al., 2009). The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's Alcohol-Related Disease Impact (ARDI) application estimated that between 2006–2010 there were 7,756 homicides annually that were attributed to excessive alcohol use (i.e. victims had a BAC > 0.10%). (Centers for Disease and Prevention, 2015a, Centers for Disease and Prevention. 2013).

That's not showing they use victims to determine the perpetrator's blood alcohol level. It only shows the connection between being drunk and being killed. No that "well the victim is drunk so the killer must have also been drunk" which is what you claim.

However, when it comes to alcohol-attributed homicides, the actual numerical estimates are usually generated on the basis of BAC in victims - not perpetrators. This is because we don't have good national data on drug/alcohol use by criminals at the time of the crime.

In terms of cannabis, at least three of the four conditions for believing a link exist:: historical, real-world/epidemiologic, and mechanism of action (actually two - intoxication and paranoia/psychosis). The lab evidence is not as strong, but we can reasonably debate why.

Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson · Jan 10

So If we are going to continue to use victim data for alcohol-attributable homicides, we should probably consider doing the same for cannabis homicides (looking at the active metabolite of THC).

If dab is 80% THC and he smokes 28 g/month, he conceivably is delivering on average ~ 300-700 mg THC/day to his brain or approx. 200 x starting oral dose of FDA-approved THC:2.5mg (and it's much less bioavailable). This industry is an unregulated public health/safety travesty.

Estimate conservatively because don't know actual THC concentration in his dabs (60-95%?) and don't know bioavailability of dabs inhaled by him. Bottom line: THC quantity consumed is huge.

Yes, I don't know how you could set up a sample, but I suspect >10% of any users in the >500mg/day range would start showing signs of psychosis within a year, even if they were previously healthy. It's a disabling dose.

Actually D'Souza and others, in human studies, have elicited acute psychosis with much lower THC iv doses in screened normal subjects. Few test beyond 20 -50 mg experimentally for fear of adverse events.

Hey @KeithNHumphreys - what do you think of this? On first glance it looked surprisingly solid. The very low homicide number is further evidence they didn't try to inflate the figures. Btw - remember how more cannabis use was going to reduce alcohol mortality? Maybe not so much.

Just another nonviolent cannabis user who (allegedly) nonviolently killed a man Thursday:

Caleb Skipps "smokes 28 grams of dab (concentrated marijuana) per month..." and smoked "around 1400 hrs this same day."

Luckily, correlation is not causation.

Add Minnesota to the long list of states that won't be legalizing cannabis in 2020; legislators clearly have realized that even in blue states public support is an inch deep and they can block recreational use without losing voters.

It's amazing; the analytic/computational tools are so much better now, but the fear of asking hard questions has led academics into irrelevance...

2/ Obviously, ethics restrictions on lab work haven't helped (though I understand them); I can't imagine the Milgram experiment would be okayed today. But the core problem is way deeper than data collection.

In terms of cannabis, at least three of the four conditions for believing a link exist:: historical, real-world/epidemiologic, and mechanism of action (actually two - intoxication and paranoia/psychosis). The lab evidence is not as strong, but we can reasonably debate why.

So if we are going to continue to use victim data for alcohol-attributable homicides, we should probably consider doing the same for cannabis homicides (looking at the active metabolite of THC).

I guess I'm being partially tendentious, or maybe overly presumptuous in thinking that in general, the victimization studies are not the primary kinds of studies people have in mind when associating alcohol use with homicides.

Let's talk more about the devastation caused by imprisonment for cannabis. Why, the state of Virginia alone has five people imprisoned for cannabis possession. Yes the victims of this unjust war number one for every 1.7 million Virginians. How does the state survive?

How about how they have also been harmed by commercial drug industries? Why is the only answer the mass commercialization of yet another substance, of which, outlets are most densely located in the neighborhoods of our most vulnerable populations?

Yes, but it's even crazier than that - advocates like @MarijuanaPolicy and the @DrugPolicyOrg push for government subsidies that ultimately will help open marijuana stores in those neighborhoods! Because that's just what poor communities with lots of problems need.

Hey Gia - I see you live in Brooklyn. Question - is Brooklyn safer now, or in 1990? 2000 or 1990? 2010 or 2000? Hint: pretend you don't run a company that profits from legal cannabis when you answer.

And my question is a really simple one: if it is so obvious that the drug war "devastated" minority communities, why does every piece of data we have - as well as the way that neighborhoods like Harlem look now - suggest the opposite?

Notably, the places where drugs have wrought devastation in the last 15 years are far more rural and white - where the "war" has mostly been less aggressive, and where the drugs are mostly opioids that in many cases have been medically provided and government/insurer paid...

Because, you know, evidence.

This sympathetic 2014 piece on West is worth a read; he'd already had problems, but he was healthy enough at the time for the writer to argue he was just misunderstood. The problem diagnosing him is telling too; Pete Davidson has talked of similar issues.

Hey have you read The New Jim Crow? I obviously disagree with the conclusion that legalizing drugs will help anything, but in terms of capturing the impact of incarceration in communities of color, I think it does a great job. Be interested to hear your thoughts.

BTW - I agree with TNJC and reformers in several ways; felons should have the vote; post-prison civil commitment is problematic (it's punishing people for thought crime); prisons should rely on solitary far less (the point of prison is not to cause mental illness)...

Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson · 1m
Cash bail for non-violent arrestees should be limited except in rare cases; police should not use military gear. Etc. But the reformers have built a case based on dishonesty about what crimes generally land people in prison - just as they're dishonest about the risks of cannabis.

More figures that truly capture the devastation the war on drugs has had on black Americans:

Black unemployment rate in 1980: 15% (8.7 percentage points higher than the white rate)

In 1990: 12.4% (7 points higher)

Today: 5.9% (2.7 points higher)

But economic statistics alone can't capture the devastation this unjust war has wrought. Let's talk about teen pregnancy.

In 1990, 1 in 8 black teens (15-19) had a child; today the figure is 1 in 36.

One nice thing that happened this year is the bad marijuana book had effectively no impact on anything, despite its 15 minutes of fame, because at least some drug war hysteria is now quickly seen for what it is. A testament to some things getting better.

About that legalization thing: Washington state may ban semi-synthetic THC concentrates, which are up to 40% of the market and rising, because of fears they cause psychosis. Glad to see @Leafly @BruceBarcott covering this issue - it's important to the profits of your owners!

Unfortunately almost every state that legalized recreational marijuana has done so through ballot initiatives. Would take another ballot initiative to reverse. Residents need to rise up and demand action!

This bill might have a real chance, at least in the Washington House - I count 22 sponsors (out of 98 legislators), and the lead, Lauren Davis, is a Democrat. The chair of the Judiciary Committee is also a sponsor. Note the explicit reference to psychosis in the second paragraph.

Serious question: what year would you pick? 1985? 1980? The big anti-drug laws were passed in 1986 and 1988. Crack took off around 1983/84, depending on who is talking; it took a couple years to mobilize a response. We toughened laws again in 1994.

Love your work Alex but you are committing some obvious analytical "crimes" here. Arbitrary end point is 1st, as 1990 is conveniently near peak in data yet well after start of full blown "War on Drugs" launched. Also, focusing on only absolute levels ignores multi-factor nature.

Add Detroit to the cities where police link cannabis with violent crime. (Recreational cannabis is legal in Michigan; stores have not yet opened in Detroit. Reminder: if the experience of Colorado etc is any guide, crime will rise after stores open.)

Again, this is why I admire @JohnFPfaff; I think he's wrong on the merits (though lately when I read about cases of multiple teenagers sentenced to 50+ years for a single murder I blanch a little), but he is honest about who's in prison, and what they've done to get there.

John Pfaff @JohnFPfaff
If you do the math here, it's easy to see that releasing everyone in prison on a drug charge has almost ZERO impact on the relative ratios of ppl in prison by race.

You had me at "self-reported online survey." As I've seen in cannabis, this kind of "research" is worse than none - it functions only to create talking points for drug advocacy groups and the journo-children who love them.

I know it is likely that by this summer the flu will have killed more people than the coronavirus. It is also possible, unlikely but possible, that the coronavirus will have wreaked worldwide havoc. So telling people to just shut up and get flu shots is pointless - and arrogant.

5/ Psychosis causes violence. The other big finding came about drug abuse. Unadjusted for other factors, people with drug use disorders had an off-the-charts risk of committing violence; in fact, they made up 1.5% of the people in the sample but committed 20% of all the violence.

6/ Drug abuse closely tracks mental illness and personality disorders, but even after the researchers adjusted for those - and other - confounding factors, they found that abusers were about 5 times as likely to commit violence, as well as 3 times as likely to be victims.

I know Democrats are angry and frustrated. But if your value proposition is: yeah, unemployment's lie and the market's up but the President must be stopped because he's a disgusting danger to our norms and values... tearing up the speech he's just given doesn't make your case.

I'm not a spring chicken. The Democrat Party has morphed into moralizing, religious like zealotry. It used to be the party of the working man and woman. It has become unrecognizable on that score. Its position on open borders alone makes it a literal, political, suicide cult.

And I know more than a few liberals that despise the modern Democrat Party. And you can bet the farm there's many liberal leaning media folks who hate the Democrat Party but can't admit it publicly for fear of being shunned by their peers.

1/ Congrats to @AmirSariaslan @seenafazel @L_Arseneault for their impressive new paper in @JAMAPsych on mental illness, drug use, and violence. Several fascinating findings in here that mainstream media outlets have naturally ignored...

2/ Background: The researchers looked at Swedish records covering 2.5 million people over 20 years to check whether people with different psychiatric diagnoses had committed and/or been victims of relatively serious violence.

5/ Psychosis causes violence. The other big finding came about drug abuse. Unadjusted for other factors, people with drug use disorders had an off-the-charts risk of committing violence; in fact, they made up 1.5% of the people in the sample but committed 20% of all the violence.

6/ Drug abuse closely tracks mental illness and personality disorders, but even after the researchers adjusted for those - and other - confounding factors, they found that abusers were about 5 times as likely to commit violence, as well as 3 times as likely to be victims.

7/ Two big takeaways here: journalists need to stop saying that people with mental illness are more likely to be the victims of violence than commit it. They may make themselves feel better, but they are simply not stating the facts - especially around psychosis.

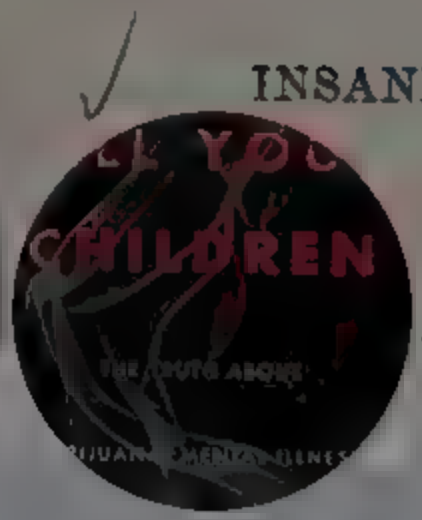
Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson · Feb 4



8/ The nexus of drug abuse and violence is very real, even after accounting for mental illness.

Erm. The official state-run Chinese news agency now reports that the #coronavirus is spread not just through coughing, feces, and touch but through the air. Solution: "canceling all social activities." I don't mean to panic anyone, but this ain't good.

Hey, ladies! If you don't want to get stabbed to death, be sure to pick roommates who aren't psychotic. Remember: NOT psychotic. Otherwise, it's on you. Love, cannabis advocates.

1/ A word about conspiracy theories:

Even in situations where the evidence is clear and authorities have gone to great efforts to be transparent - 9/11, say, or the vaccine-autism link - conspiracy theories are powerful forces...

Preventing coronavirus from becoming an epidemic in America will require drastic changes from the Chinese Communist Party, whose secrecy and paranoia are responsible for its rapid growth.

The Chinese Communist Party's tactics are always the same: deny and deceive.

The CCP must be straight with the world on Coronavirus.

Global health is not something that can be scrubbed by the CCP's censors.

Alex, would you also attribute the nearly 20% decline in 2020 NYC murder and rape to bail reform? You are often accused of cherry picking data to support your narrative; these crime data and your comments seem to support such criticism.

I'm not keen idea of betting on crime, and betting on homicides seems especially distasteful. On merits, point is many factors impact short-term local crime data. If you think bail reform accounts for NYC uptick in robberies, do you think it also explains other crime data?

My point here is not to defend NY bail reform, but rather to spotlight my worries about using one-sided, short-term crime data to advance a policy narrative. Data is very important, but so too is trying to discuss all data in a responsible and careful way.

No. The shooting data, which is way up, suggests the murder number is statistical noise. I don't know what's happening with rape, but it moves sharply year to year. And neither of those crimes were the target of bail reform.

And here's @johnjpfaff - maybe the leading academic advocate for decarceration - admitting that jes' maybe bail reform is increasing crime. I couldn't agree more, John. Appreciate the honesty.

> Berenson's "I'm just looking at facts, be reasonable here" framing—disingenuous as it is—is quite common. And it has to be called out.

> Decarceration is NOT going to be a free lunch, esp in the short run. Sometimes it may make reported crime go up (NOT saying that is case here).

Okay, maybe this is really what's going on; I don't know. What I do know is that - intentionally or not - this is a framing device. And the effect is to reduce fear. We - pretty much all of us - are more concerned about low-probability, high-mortality events than the reverse...

Plane crashes scare us; car crashes don't. Ebola scares us; the flu doesn't. As far as I can tell there is no evidence of lots of infected but asymptomatic people in Wuhan (or anywhere); in fact the mortality rate has ticked up the last couple of days...

Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson · 6m
And even the scientists arguing this theory basically admit it's a guess and they will have to conduct large-scale population tests after the epidemic to prove it.

Fascinating piece on the dilemma China faces now (and the world may later): economic crisis v. public health chaos. The problem is that even at a 1% mortality rate (and the real rate looks higher), the numbers get very big very fast...

A 1% death rate x 10% infection rate = 1.5 million deaths in China alone. Double the mortality and infection estimates, deaths reach 6 million. It's not that the country will collapse - 12 million people died in China in 2018 - but the strain on the health system will be huge.

That's why comparisons to the flu are so facile - the flu kills .01% of people it infects. Our health care systems just aren't built (nor can they be, really) to have the excess capacity a true pandemic requires.

Btw - I am not sure comparing cases now in Singapore/HK to the reported number in Wuhan in January makes sense - Singapore and HK have more developed health systems and are paying much closer attention, so maybe the numbers aren't comparable? Then again I wasn't FDA Commissioner.

It's the only data we have. You're right that there were likely more actual cases in Wuhan when they reported on their first 50, and Singapore is far more likely to have captured a higher percent of their total actual cases. These are the challenges of relying on data from China.

I was a long time marijuana user that quit for about 5 years and then started dabbling with it again throughout 2019. Slowly but surely my daily consumption started to increase and I was having negative experiences, mainly increased anxiety and paranoia. I saw you on Joe Rogan, and listened to the entire talk and to be honest wasn't too convinced to take a serious look at my habit except for one thing that you said, which was something close to, "I just don't get why people keep using it when they're getting paranoid." This stuck in my thoughts, and because I was monitoring my experiences and being honest with myself when I had negative reactions, your words were part of what helped me decide to quit using something that was only causing me harm. I know for me smoking was an activity, a thing to do when I needed to zone out from my daily stress, I like the smell and taste of marijuana, and I guess it was even a part of my identity, but I also value having a clear head and

Alex,

Thank you for your thoughtful and prompt reply. I am a 23 year old young man who had been using "medical" marijuana for 2 years. I grew up thinking marijuana was a benign and harmless drug. It wasn't until I dealt with addiction (which I was led to beleive was impossibe) and suffered my first manic episode that I started to questuon whether marijuana was harmful or not.

As I continued to use, my cognition continued to decline and I tried to blame it on everything else except marijuana. I started developing paranoia and extreme anxeity and it got to the point that I no longer enjoyed getting high yet I still continued to use. Your book has been incredibly shocking (in a good/helpful way) and has confirmed what I have

How does it feel to make a living promoting a dangerous addictive drug you've had to quit using yourself because of side effects? I don't know, but @thealicemoon does. Let's ask!

This story by Anya Doyle-Burr was published by the Valley News on Feb. 15

RANDOLPH — One-quarter of the emergency department staff members at Gifford Medical Center are considering leaving their jobs due to the stress of caring for patients in psychiatric crisis, the department's clinical nurse coordinator told state legislators at a recent forum at the Randolph hospital.

While emergency department staff are trained to triage patients to move them on to the next level of care — or send them home — within hours, psychiatric patients sometimes must stay in the emergency department for days until they can be

I'm an ER doc at Cedars, Vermont Medical Center. The focus on involuntary patients is important, but misleading. Ten times that number of voluntary patients wait days and weeks for inpatient beds, and to my knowledge these are not tracked by the state. But the bar is so high for involuntary status that many of those in emergency departments who are technically voluntary are still very, very sick. This remains an ongoing travesty, and a human rights debacle. We are rightly enraged by the warehousing of children at the border, but not that which occurs in our very own state. It is a direct result of current

I'd guess - based on the number of studies the book references and the amount of ink I devote to discussing the Dunedin work - about 2-3%. Which isn't bad, considering I'm looking at 150 years of research. Great question, though.

So in their (odd) insistence that China cannot and should not be held culpable for the origins of the #coronavirus, mainstream media/scientific types are (intentionally, I think) conflating two theories of what the virus is and how it may first have spread to humans:

But the second theory is that the virus is naturally occurring and was in the possession of and being experimented on by Chinese scientists at the Wuhan Centers for Disease Control - a lab that, insanely, is located in the center of a giant city, adjacent to a hospital (!)...

Also: who is maintaining essential infrastructure, the electric grid and Internet/communications hubs? There has been a surprising lack of news on the ground out of Wuhan lately. I am starting to wonder if the dearth of coms is a bug or a feature from the Chinese gov't pov.

My last day in New Zealand. Thanks to Bob McCoskrie and Nick Tuitasi for their warm NZ hospitality; thanks to all who came to hear the truth on the dangers of cannabis; and thanks to @_chloeswarbrick for admitting the fact she hasn't read my book won't keep her from attacking it!

1/ The prison "reform" obsession with 1970 is striking not just because crime was far higher but because it marks an historic low in US involuntary institutionalization; what the left seems to have forgotten is that in 1955 we had 750,000 people locked up.

Wow. A new @SentencingProj fact sheet shows that there are more people in America serving life sentences today (206,000) than the entire prison population in 1970 (196,000).

Thanks to @kingindica_tv for this public service announcement about THC and "extreme paranoia and anxiety", aka (barely) subclinical psychosis...

Words of advice: NEVER do a waterfall bong if you have a lightweight tolerance. I can probably say the same for dabs. You can increase the chances of experiencing extreme paranoia and anxiety. Know your limits and stick to it. No need to go over the top with cannabis.

Yesterday around 1 in the morning I did a waterfall that my friend made for me. For starters it almost made me vomit. Then once the high fully settled in it made me VERY scared and nervous. I was paranoid that the weed was laced. I couldn't stop walking in circles in his kitchen.

King Indica @Kingind.ca_tv · 4d
I felt my heart pounding and I had other bodily sensations that amplified the anxiety. I thought it was just over for me. I've done powerful waterfalls plenty of times before in high school and none of them made me feel scared to that extent.

Coronavirus is coming. It's highly infectious. It doesn't have a cure or a vaccine. It badly sickens 1 in 5 people who get it. It kills - well, we don't know, maybe 1 in 50. And we can't contain it. It is going to roll around the globe in waves.

It is going to cause serious economic disruption and probably strain hospitals and doctors and nurses beyond their breaking points. This is real and it's happening.

A good thread, worth reading. The problem is that the mortality here is so much higher than the flu that asking people to stay at home will be very tough. Unless you were alive in 1918 you've not seen this mix of transmissibility and lethality. We are in unchartered territory.

This chart shows the average probability that an American will die over the course of a year. A 2% death rate is 20 per 1,000 - which is far > the annual rate of anyone under 50 (and higher than women all the way to 65). In other words it isn't low at all...

Singapore is still hopeful they can get control of their outbreak and they aren't simply focused on mitigation steps. But they may be in a class by themselves. They have an excellent public health system, took early and aggressive steps, and have superior diagnostic capabilities.

It looks like Wall Street is finally starting to pay attention. Keep in mind stocks are overpriced by most historical measures and fiscal/monetary stimuli are already huge; in other words the Fed/WH don't have a lot of levers if we have a bear market.

Good to hear. The problem is Japan looks to have community transmission of its own (not accelerating like SK, but still real).

I don't know where you live but in much of the northern US temperatures "are consistently above 80 degrees" about six weeks a year, and in northern Europe not at all.

Why? Anybody with a history of psychosis (or current drug-induced psychosis) or some other mental illnesses can be civilly committed if a psychiatrist finds him dangerous to self - or others. A finding easy to apply to someone newly arrested for, say, assault...

Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson · 3m

3/ So folks who would simply have been allowed to stay in jail awaiting their trials are now being moved at great expense into the psychiatric health care system (where they have no guarantee of release). From the point of view of public safety, they're off the streets...

Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson · 54s

4/ And some of them may be getting care that they need (whether or not they like it). But remember, seriously mentally ill folks were already being moved into the forensic system; this is pretty clearly a workaround for the failure to include "dangerousness" as a bail factor.

If this poll is right, national support for cannabis legalization has ticked down notably - it shows support at 59%, down from a peak of about 65% last year. Notably, it comes from a progressive advocacy group - it can't be accused of anti-cannabis bias.

Are you asserting that it is worse for a person to be taken to a health care facility than to be locked in a cage in modern day NY? Isn't that a bigger and more telling story than how police may react to bail law changes?

Legit question - again, tho, people with obvious, severe mental illness were (or should have been) already being diverted. Some of the new folks may fall in the camp of "should've been treated." For others - especially w/drug psychoses - this is a way around a badly designed law.

But, again, if people are struggling with any kind of mental health issues (short or long term), don't we want them pushed away from CJ system and toward health system? If health system needs improving, let's do that rather than keep people in CJ system who should not be there.

By definition, this relationship means cannabis is a "gateway" to other drugs; reasonable researchers can and do debate the reasons why. But to say that cannabis use does not predict the later use of other drugs is a lie. I'd say I expect more from DPA, but I don't.

Seems like a good time to remind reporters who cover drug policy issues that despite its name, @DrugPolicyOrg is not a "policy" organization; it is a drug legalization lobbying organization that openly has sought money from businesses that profit from selling cannabis.

Bloomberg is wrong. Most doctors believe that marijuana is much less harmful than alcohol and tobacco and almost every other recreational drug. It does not cause brain damage and no human being in the history of human civilization has ever died from overdosing on weed. #DemDebate

This is a polite way of saying it's about as pointless an insult as has ever been invented: "Ooh you're old." Coming from a 36-year-old makes it especially juicy. Pro tip for @NomikiKonst: if you're going with "OK boomer" best scrub your age from Wikipedia.

Today in [redacted]:

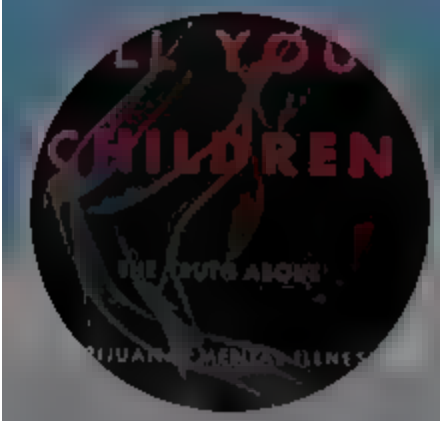
3 reasons to think it will only be flu-plus:

1) China's new infections have (reportedly) plunged; outside Wuhan they're close to zero.
2) Singapore and HK - tightly packed cities - have controlled new cases.
3) The deaths are mostly in the old and sick.

2 7 42

Alex Berenson
@AlexBerenson

And 3 reasons to think it won't:



1) China essentially had to shut down to slow the spread.
2) Many patients need massive supportive care; many docs and nurses get sick despite careful precautions; thus it strains the health-care system far more than flu.
3) It's very contagious.

If I had to guess, I'd guess in a year or two this will look more like a series of rolling provincial/national outbreaks than The Walking Dead. We'll get some okay antivirals and a moderately effective vaccine; the economic hit will be real and heaviest on the travel industry...

And the health-care system will cope - thanks to the everyday heroism of nurses and doctors - but the strain will be serious and some triaging will quietly happen. In other words, not the flu, not the end of the world.

But, like Jon Snow, I know nothing.

Let's hope it works as well as the ones in British Columbia, where a mere 5,000 people have died of overdose since 2016.

True story: The better we get at harm reduction, the more people die. I wonder why.

I am regularly amazed that well-meaning mental-health professionals who think they know the data on psychosis and violence - and who SHOULD know the data - in fact have no idea of the data. This is not an academic issue; it puts families at risk every day.

This is... not quite true. 98% of infected people survive -tho even that # is squishy. Some folks get it and don't even know, which would make the survival rate even higher; but early Chinese data show that about 15% (!) of people admitted to critical care die after a month...

Davis Medical Center for the novel coronavirus (COVID-19) is being investigated by the CDC as possibly the first patient to have received the infection from exposure in the community.

This patient was transferred to us from another Northern California hospital on Wednesday, Feb 19. When the patient arrived, the patient had already been intubated, was on a ventilator, and given droplet protection orders because of an undiagnosed and suspected viral condition. Since the patient arrived with a suspected viral infection, our care teams have been taking the proper infection prevention (contact droplet) precautions during the patient's stay.

Upon admission, our team asked public health officials if this case could be COVID-19. We requested COVID-19 testing by the CDC, since neither Sacramento County nor CDPH is doing testing for coronavirus at this time. Since the patient did not fit the existing CDC criteria for COVID-19, a test was not immediately administered. UC Davis Health does not control the testing process.

2/ It has been obvious for a decade-plus that the US's claim to have "the best healthcare in the world" isn't close to true. Most expensive, yes. Also the most fragmented and profit-driven. Let's hope we are not about to pay a terrible price.

With naloxone there is no real way to calculate the real-world iatrogenic effects of its availability - which is why I agree it should be. But agreeing it should be available as a moral imperative is not the same as agreeing it actually has or has proven a net benefit.

Yes, Vancouver. The great harm reduction success story. Where this discussion began. Remind me what happened in Vancouver and BC in 2018, with naloxone on every corner?

As an aside, I don't know why @RyanMarino insists on pretending moral hazard isn't real. Of course it's real. Here's what Judith Grisel - a former addict herself, and neuroscientist - has to say on the subject:

Dream Weavers: Opiates 67

And now we come to the crux. Ryan is offended that with a mere college degree (and a decade as a reporter for @nytimes), I've somehow written a book that has become part of the public debate around cannabis. And now I have the gall to challenge him further. 'Spect my authority!

I do. Prohibition is impossible because alcohol is far more widely used than other drugs but taxes on it should be higher and availability reduced. Ideally advertising banned as well, though that's impossible legally. Almost everyone who studies this reaches that conclusion...

But legalized industries inevitably fight for their rights and profits and make regulation difficult. Which is yet another reason legalizing cannabis is such a mistake.

Alcohol being bad is not an argument for marijuana being good. The wide availability of alcohol with attendant social consequences tells us all we need to know about widely available legal marijuana.

I'm Canadian, so laws are different. Suboxone is a controlled substance. The purpose is to reduce mortality.

The focus of the research isn't on impact on parenting, which is likely why we don't comment. I'd expect "parents who are treating their disease" will positively kids.
